Had the Japanese been far-sighted enough to treat the Koreans, who are not a conquered race, as England treated the conquered Boers, there would have been a genuine amalgamation of the two peoples. And it is not a long step from amalgamation to assimilation. But the Japanese ignored this golden opportunity to win the loyalty and friendship of their new subjects. They entered on their task in a wrong spirit; they were hampered by mistaken ideas. Failing utterly to understand the Korean's psychology, they assumed an attitude of contempt instead of sympathy. And without sympathy on the part of the governors for the governed, good government is impossible. Imagine the upheaval in the British Empire if England should suppress the vernacular newspapers of the Hindus, if she should forbid the use of Arabic in the courts of Egypt, if she should expropriate the teaching of the Koran in the schools of her Mohammedan possessions. Yet that is a fair parallel to the policy of the Japanese in Korea.

Despite their decadence—perhaps because of it—the Koreans make a pathetic appeal to one's sympathies. There is the pitiful story of their "peaceful" revolution of March 1, 1919. Throughout the world war the Koreans had been growing a new spirit, which finally blossomed when they heard of President Wilson's pronouncement on the self-determination of small nations. The uprising was planned by visionary leaders who ordered no bloodshed and no violence. There would have been none if the Koreans had had their way. On the other hand, the Koreans would have been successful if they, too, had gone in for the more usual variety of revolution. Needless to say the revolt was a flat failure:

So long as there was no violence it would have been the part of wisdom, it seems to me, to have let the pent-up emotions of the people escape through the safety valve provided by the demonstration, instead of attempting forcibly to suppress them. Much bloodshed might have been averted if the authorities had possessed the psychology of one village policeman, who permitted the people in his district to celebrate for three days without molestation. Then he told them that if they wanted independence they should build up an army and navy; this would require much money, so they had better return to their work and accumulate the wealth necessary to develop the nation. They agreed with him that it was sound advice and dispersed peaceably without any harm having been done.

Great as his sympathies are with the Koreans, Mr. Powell agrees that they are better under Jap supervision:

From personal observation on the spot, I am convinced that the general condition of the Korean peasantry is appreciably higher than it ever was, or could have been, under Korean administration. This is not to be interpreted as meaning that I do not sympathize with the Koreans, for I do. They have been the victims of cruelty, injustice, and oppression. Nor would they be worthy of respect if they did not prefer to rule themselves. But I can also sympathize with Japan. During one of the most trying periods in the world's history—disliked, distrusted, and opposed by Koreans, Chinese, Russians, and most of the foreigners living in the Far East—she has jerked a nation out of the depths of poverty, degradation, and despair, as though by its collar, set it on its feet, and is teaching it to "play the game." And, as Count Terauchi once remarked, "It is no easy task to uplift a decayed people."

So much for Japan and Korea. The latter half of "Asia at the Crossroads" is devoted to China and the Philippines, respectively. Space prevents adequate treatment here of either and we therefore refer the reader to the document itself.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending May 6, 1922, were $151,300,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $128,100,000; a gain of $22,200,000.

An investment in municipal bonds is often characterized as "tax dodging," and there can be no doubt that their recent popularity is due, in large part, to the immunity they enjoy, but the practice of issuing such securities free of tax is as old as the government itself; they contravene no law or statute, and their purchase can not be termed "tax carry out any refunding that may be under contemplation, of the war debts. How this can be accomplished, except through the disagreeable alternative of additional taxation of some form or other, or a new bond or note issue, is difficult to see, and the problem, in any event, is exceedingly serious. It arises out of the fact, primarily, that if the returns from the larger financial centres afford a true index of the whole country, the receipts of the government from individual and corporation income taxes for the calendar year 1921 will show a falling off of between $900,000,000 and $1,200,000,000 from the year before. Both New York and Chicago, the largest two revenue-producing centres of the country, show decreases of between 30 and 40 per cent. under the initial payments made on March 15th, and there has been no suggestion that exceptional prosperity elsewhere in the country will alter the ratio of decrease reported by the large cities.

In a prospective deficit in the national revenues, which may reach $1,000,000,000, it is impossible to see the likelihood of an early reduction in income taxes, and at first thought it would appear as though an increase was unavoidable, and particularly so if the Soldiers' Bonus bill, which passed the House on March 23d by a vote of 333 to 70, should likewise pass the Senate and become a law, for the measure calls for contingent expenditures as high as $4,500,000,000. But the difficulty of meeting the deficit out of higher income taxes centres in the fact that the decrease in revenue was caused in large part by the prevailing schedules. The government exacts so much already that business incentive has been destroyed, industrial depression accentuated, and the national income reduced. Men will not toil and toil like slaves or incur unusual risks if they have to give up—as they do in instances—as much as 50 per cent. of their profits to the government. To escape such exactions they curtail their business activities or invest in tax-free bonds, and Congress itself has provided one convenient avenue of partial immunity through the Farm Loan Bank bonds.

That a more cheerful sentiment prevails throughout the country, and that special lines of industry have disclosed signs of improvement, is highly encouraging, and it is not unlikely that as a result of low stocks of merchandise of some descriptions and a normal seasonal demand, the recovery will proceed still further. But it is difficult to see a general industrial revival—a sustained, confident buying movement—until the community is relieved of some of the burdens of taxation which are sapping the life blood of business, until the deficiency of the revenue is made good and certain necessary adjustments have been completed. The quickening impulses of approaching spring have not been reflected in all departments of trade alike, and whereas some of them have improved in recent weeks, others, according to the commercial agencies and other observers, have reacted still further.

This is peculiarly true of the retail and mail-order business, and all textiles, which are reported as ranging from unsatisfactory to poor. The unwillingness of the consuming public to pay a higher price for anything, or even to buy as largely as in the past at any level of prices, appears to be a distinctive feature of distributive business everywhere, and there is a marked reluctance upon the part of retailers and jobbers to buy except for their immediate wants or for very early delivery. No one appears willing to stock up largely in anticipation of future requirements, and this has been as marked in iron and steel, which has shown more vitality recently than any other industry, as elsewhere.

Hunter, Dulin & Co. announce the acquisition to their sales department of Mr. E. Clinton La Montagne of this city. Mr. La Montagne before joining the above-mentioned bond house was associate manager of the San Francisco office of H. J. Baker & Brothers, importers and exporters, of New York City.

Announcement was recently made in Portland by Carl S. Kely of his resignation as vice-president of the Lumbermen's Trust Company. He has acquired a partnership in-dodging" in an unlawful or offensive sense. It is not impossible, however, that the continued manufacture, on a large scale, of securities of a character that investors can purchase, and thereby minimize some of the burdens of Federal taxation, may create a very difficult situation for the government, says John Grant Dater in Harper's Magazine. And this appears the more likely when you consider that in addition to the state and municipal bonds already outstanding—estimated at between $10,000,000,000 and $12,000,000,000—

Determining the Value of Investments

In the course of our sixty-four years of experience we have recommended and administered thousands of investments. It is a source of satisfaction to know that our investigations have been so detailed and careful, and the resulting judgments as to the value of securities so sound, that we have been able to offer our customers reliable investment counsel.

Another connection between our clients and ourselves is the effectiveness of our investment service, which includes stock and bond statistical files and direct private wires to all Eastern centers and Canada. Our wire service insures instantaneous executions of orders on all Eastern exchanges as well as on the floor of the San Francisco Stock & Bond Exchange.

For those interested, trading accounts will be carried on a conservative basis.

In 1918 he took a leave of absence and was in charge of the distribution of United States treasury certificates for the Twelfth Federal Reserve District, issued in anticipation of the liberty loans of that year, and made his headquarters at the Federal Reserve Bank at San Francisco.

Approximately 80 per cent. of the stockholders of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company are residents of California, according to A. F. Hockenbeamer, vice-president and treasurer of that utility. A recent report further discloses the fact that at the close of 1921 the total number of shareholders was 18,814. Indicative of the widespread distribution of the ownership of the company among people of moderate means is the fact that 9831, or 52 per cent., hold ten shares or less. Only 1059 stockholders own more than 100 shares.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company reports that it has been the successful bidder at recent sales of four various school district issues, as follows:

$12,000 Howard School District 6 per cent. bonds, maturing in one to twelve years. Howard School District is situated in Madera County.

$18,000 Orange Cove Joint Union School District 6 per cent. bonds. This district is situated in Fresno and Tulare counties. It has an assessed valuation of $1,066,390 and a total bonded debt, including this issue, of $49,000.

$8000 Highland School District 5 per cent. bonds, maturing in one to eight years. Highland School District is situated in San Bernardino County. The district has an assessed valuation of $1,015,920, with these bonds as its only debt. Its population is estimated at 2000.

$7000 Jones Elementary School District 6 per cent. bonds, maturing $500 one to fourteen years. The district is situated in Colusa County.

AN OFFICE BOY

More than a year ago we received a letter asking for information on bonds that we had advertised. The manager of one of our branch offices, recognizing the address near his own office, made a call to offer personal assistance.

He found the writer of the letter to be an office boy who had saved $100 and wanted more interest than his savings account paid him.

A later appointment was made with this office boy and he was given as much consideration and information as the president of the company.

Today this office boy has two $100 bonds that yield 7½% interest and he is paying on a third.

We are proud to have this office boy client.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

It has long been admitted that the Victorian era was the Golden Age of the novel: that though that much-classified form of literature had been discovered in the eighteenth century and commercialized in the twentieth, its palmiest days belonged by all that was fitting to the nineteenth century, and more particularly to the part appropriated by the most domesticated reign in English history. As the Golden Age of anything usually refers to its callow youth, we may as well allow the dictum to remain unchallenged. With the passing of the queen's benignant influence on life and letters, the novel went into a phase that looked like decline and was hailed as such by the pessimist, who was loud in the land. It was really a period of reaction, and the callow youth of the most popular form of literature, having sown its wild oats, has now settled down into what may be called the silver age of seasoned maturity. Quite young, practically unheard-of writers—mostly English, we admit with regret—turn out novels today that would not have disgraced the signature of the Victorian giants. They are, in fact, more palatable to modern taste, which has finally, in the younger generation at least, discarded the shibboleth of Victorian prudery and who though they may consider it needless to call a spade a spade, since all the world recognizes that tool, yet prefer to call it a spade than to swathe it in chiffon, tie a blue satin bow on it, and refer, and that rather gingerly, to a draped and decorated instrument of floriculture.

This verbose peroration is simply to the effect that we prefer the thoughtful novel of today, lighted by modern psychology and interested in our own kind of problem, to the grand style of the Victorians. It may be urged that the masters of fiction knew the human heart and charted it well. They did, but they were too general. One is, after all, not interested in the lowest common denominator of humanity, for we all know it and no amount of grand style supplies anything new to the subject. The modern novelist, for whom we are obviously holding a brief, is more concerned with special cases, of which there are, strangely enough, an infinite number, and which, despite their specialness, usually come home to us with more force than the ideal romances of even such masters as Thackeray and Meredith. We read those gentlemen for their style—an excuse one would never tender for the moderns, who when they have a style at all have an execrable brand.

There have been any number of good novels lately—novels that really hold one to the end and that you remember and compare with others. It is astonishing, too, how living the personalities of these English creations are. The novel that has aroused all these diffuse reflections is by Beatrice Kean Seymour—"Intrusion" (Seltzer; $2). The plot of "Intrusion" is simply the working out of the tangle caused by a young person of dubious taste and position, but considerable attractions, crossing the lives of a family of cultivated tastes and quiet habits. Plots always fall into two categories—those that are factitious and those that are not; and Miss Seymour's belongs to the latter, needless to say, small group. The situations in "Intrusion" are inevitable, and that is a lot to say for any book. It is, in fact, a story of dramatic situation rather than of theme or character. One could imagine Miss Seymour writing excellent plays. But meanwhile she has written a noteworthy novel.

Two books of a somewhat similar nature but a very different tone are "Contemporary American Novelists," by Carl Van Doren (Macmillan), and "Readers and Writers," by A. R. Orage (Knopf; $1.75). Mr. Orage's book is a collection of very short, chatty, critical papers on current letters that have previously appeared in the New Age. Because of their sporadic nature one doesn't expect such a book to have "form," and its freedom from mechanical mold is one of its charms. The great distinction of "Readers and Writers," however, is that its author has a mind with a critical, ironic edge, which is better in our estimation than one with a razor edge, which is not at all discriminating or even Miss Lowell's favorite kind of mind, which she likens to a sword.

"Contemporary American Novelists, 1900-1920," is a much-needed review of that period. Mr. Van Doren hardly comes up to his usual brilliant surface, nor does he sink to his usual depths. It is a queer fact that there is something petrifying about writing a book of the thesis variety—definite period, phase, etc. It is inevitable to lose some spontaneity in the exigency of keeping within bounds and of including everything that should be there likewise. However, "Contemporary American Novelists" is a good library adjunct and to the reader of American novels will be a welcome commentary. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

It is announced by Boni & Liveright that John Paris, to whom the authorship of "Kimon" is credited, is a pseudonym. The author's identity is to be disclosed after the Genoa Conference.

T. S. Stribling, the author of "Birthright," the novel dealing with the American negro problem, is frequently portrayed with negro features. The artists who sketch these likenesses from photographs sent out by Mr. Stribling's publishers, are gifted with a lively imagination or are very susceptible to suggestion. For Mr. Stribling is not a negro. In answer to many requests for information on this score the Century Company announces that Mr. Stribling is a very tall, very bony, very blond, very white type of man, whose head-structure and color rather suggest Scandinavian forbears.

Vachel Lindsay's book on "The Art of the Moving Picture" is just being brought out in a new edition by the Macmillan Company. Mr. Lindsay has revised his volume of five years ago to bring it into step with the newest developments in cinematography. The Philadelphia Public Ledger calls it the "first æsthetic philosophy of the screen."

In answer to the surmises that "Alice Adams," Mr. Tarkington's last novel, was a reply to "Main Street" the Bookman has discovered that Booth Tarkington is one of the few people who have never read this much-talked-about novel and further that when he wrote Alice's story he wasn't seeking to present any of the problems of the celebrated younger generation.

Mme. Marguerite Audoux, who won international fame with her two autobiographical novels, "Marie Claire" and "Marie Claire's Workshop," has written a new book, which is shortly to be published in Paris. Five thousand copies of the English translation of "Marie Claire" were sold within a week of its publication—as Mr. Arnold Bennett points out in the little volume of collected articles entitled "Books and Persons."

Harold MacGrath draws his inspiration from odd corners and small coincidences. "Luck o' the Irish" was suggested to MacGrath when a film balked at a motion-picture show. The result was the familiar one of feet dangling from the top of the screen and heads and bodies rising from the bottom. There flashed into his mind the whimsical story of a youth in a basement who falls in love with the owner of a pair of ankles that he has watched passing his window for weeks, and who follows the fair unknown around the world.

J. M. Kerrigan, the Irish actor and wit, the friend of Lady Gregory, James Joyce, and other celebrated Dubliners, was talking the other day to a group of pre-Volsteadian cronies, about "A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man" and the other Joyce books. Mr. Kerrigan, who is a good Catholic, said that he could not understand the effort to suppress "A Portrait of the Artist." "Joyce," said Mr. Kerrigan, "is a Catholic. Only he likes to confess in public. The 'Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man' is sacramental, not sacrilegious."

The use of metal appears to have been discovered by man between four and five thousand years ago.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Unnoticed London.

Perhaps there is nothing else quite so delightful as a well-written book of travel—not the impressions of a motorist speeding through Normandy or Sussex and reveling in pastel-colored adjectives; but the browsing around of the historico-archæologist that is not so much travel as literary excavation. Mr. Montizambert has just published a travel book of this type that reminds us of nothing so much as a delightful series of books called "English Lands, Letters and Kings," by a scholarly author named Mitchell whose first name has escaped us. Mr. Montizambert's book, "Unnoticed London," has the same happy erudition that is never formidable and never condescending. The facts you already know you meet as old friends; the new facts you are delighted to know. All of these peregrinations about London, through Chelsea, of Sir Thomas More and tea-shop fame, to Soho, around Chapside, and Holburn, and in Whitehall are rich in historical and literary associations, not one of which, you comfortably feel, has the author missed; or not many, at any rate. "Unnoticed London" is an ideal working guide—incidentally of pocket dimensions. One can imagine no greater pleasure than following in Mr. Martizambert's footsteps with his book in hand. Barring that ideal pastime there is still a considerable pleasure in revoking old memories of London celebrities and London history and of amassing a new knowledge of these worthies and their times.

Nene.

"Nene," the novel that took the Prix Goncourt and which has established a high-water mark among French best-sellers, is doubly remarkable. It is noteworthy in the first place that a Frenchman should write this book, and Ernest Perochon is emphatically a Frenchman, that is more like the close-to-nature writing of the Scandinavians or Teutons than the conventional tradition of the French. The other astonishing fact about "Nene" in addition to its un-Frenchness is that it does not belong to any of the modern schools, nationalities aside. It stands quite alone in racial temperament and in technical form. Richard Le Gallienne compares "Nene" to Thomas Hardy's work. It belongs to the genre of Hardy in that it is an epic of the soil, but on that score one might as well compare it to Knut Hamsun. In reality it has neither the factitious sombreness of Hardy nor the forced note of squalor that sounds throughout the work of Hamsun. "Nene" is superior to the works of either of those recognized masters. And we suspect that it is so because its author created it unknowingly. It was not a pot-boiler nor a literary essay. If one were completely ignorant of the history of "Nene" he would know that its spontaneity and its vraisemblance were not the result of painting the lily of the fields, but of living in the fields themselves.

The World of Sound.

A fascinating book on popular physics is composed by a series of six lectures on sound by Sir William Bragg. Originally delivered at the Royal Institution, London, to a mixed audience of children and adults, Sir William's lectures are as fascinating to youngsters as only facts can be and are informative reading for adults. Practically every one will be glad to renew his physics with these lectures on sound in music, sounds of the sea, of the country, of the town, and sound in war. Professor Bragg is Quain professor of physics in the University of London, and he has succeeded in bringing out the beauty of physical science as practically no one since Tyndall has.

Best Laid Schemes.

Meredith Nicholson's new collection of Indianapolis yarns, entitled "Best Laid Schemes," is a group of six clever stories, any one of which makes a pleasant half-hour's reading. Mr. Nicholson's trend is obvious—he makes no pretense to the mystery story—but his manner is beguiling and for the most part the Indians who take their more or less amusing course through "Best Laid Schemes" are as convincing a dramatist personae as will be found in short stories. Mr. Nicholson takes his themes from the trivialities that beset the daily path which are the more amusing by virtue of their familiarity.

The Economic Basis of Politics

Persons fond of the bromidia that "capital and labor should get together," or that strikes should be ended by compulsory arbitration, or who expect now or at any other time a dawn of industrial peace as either possible or desirable, would do well to consider a few conclusions of Charles A. Beard in his little volume named above. He traces the doctrines of philosophers ancient and modern, discusses "economic groups and the structure of the state," pays his respects to the paradox of what he calls equalitarian democracy, and finally runs his doctrine to its lair in the tenth number of the Federalist, wherein our own James Madison laid down certain things as fundamental, which the author presents somewhat as follows: Society is made up inevitably of differing and often conflicting interests. The regulation of these interests "constitutes the principal task of modern statesmen, and involves the spirit of party in the necessary and ordinary operations of government. Such is the design of the universe. The recognition of this fact is the beginning of wisdom—and of statesmanship." The reader will find much in this little book that is suggestive and more that will instruct him definitely. The great economic fact of the steam engine appeals to the author as fundamental, and the shift to mobile capital in the form of machinery seems to him profound. "So rapidly did this new form of property accumulate," he says, "that even in the United States by the middle of the nineteenth century it exceeded in value the agricultural land of the country." With the communist upheaval in Russia in 1917 the world saw an attempt to abolish class antagonism by the nationalization of land and industrial capital. The nationalization of the land was a "mere gesture," and as for other forms of capital and production "when the communists ceased to be mere opponents of capitalists and were charged with management, they soon discovered the unreality of their rhetoric and the futility of the hope that a system of equality in pay would draw forth vast productive energies." So the problem of property today is less simple than in the older agricultural societies; and industries must be diversified. The book contains little real nutriment for socialistic hopes, and not much more for the idea of industrial peace. In that it seems sane and practical, and of value.

Riches for a Song

According to Le Figaro, it is a simple matter to get rich. All that is necessary is to get some canary birds and put them into dark rooms where phonographs incessantly repeat one song.

At the end of three weeks the canary, if it has not grown insane, will repeat this air. Once it knows it the bird will not forget it. That's the moment to teach it another.

When it knows five airs, stop its instruction. (There is no instance of a canary remembering six airs.) Pack it up and send it to America. The Americans pay generously for canaries that sing five songs. Truly, a lucrative and patriotic enterprise. If all Frenchmen applied this recipe they would all be rich in six months and the franc would, in New York, be worth $2.

ice-bags, hot-water bottles, bedpans, hypodermic needles, soap. As many as eighty patients use one thermometer. Patients coming for operations must bring their own bandages. A little Russian girl fell in the street and broke her leg terribly. She was finally taken to a hospital where, after she had waited several hours, the doctor came and set her leg. Not until two days later could they bind it with adhesive tape. By superb effort, the doctors and nurses of Moscow have been able to keep the death rate from typhus particularly down to about 10 per cent., whereas outside the hospitals it has been about 50 per cent.—Jessica Smith, Relief Worker with the American Friends and Correspondent of the American Medical Aid for Russia.

Sir Arthur Wing Pinero returns once more to the footlights with a play of miracle and imagination, somewhat in the vein of Sir James Barrie. The creator of "Iris" has given up social problems to bring upon the stage the imps and witches, angels, cherubs, and miraculous transformations which some British critics are unkind enough to say remind them of a Christmas pantomime.

The New Water Ordinance

The unanimous action of the Board of Supervisors that ended the long-continued difficulties concerning your water supply means, first of all, abundant water for this growing City.

It means that 24 million gallons will be added to San Francisco's daily supply, raising the total yield to 66 million gallons daily.

It means that Spring Valley will raise Calaveras Dam in the Alameda County part of the system, and extend its conduit facilities to Irvington.

It means that the City will construct immediately the Bay division of the Hetch Hetchy line—that section from Irvington to Crystal Springs reservoir in San Mateo County.

It means that Spring Valley will pay interest during construction on the cost of this Bay division of the big conduit that will eventually transmit water from the Sierras. Under no other conditions of construction could the City save this very considerable expense.

It means that Spring Valley will pay the City yearly some $250,000 for the use of this conduit.

It means that new residential districts and new industrial enterprises in San Francisco will get all the water they need.

It means that the City and the Company, acting together under the provisions of the decision of the Railroad Commission, have set San Francisco more firmly on the pathway to expansion and prosperity.

AT THE ORPHEUM.

Nobody need ever put on any superior airs about vaudeville, since the commonsensical intellectualists who have the good of the stage at heart concede that it is a boon to many people whose wholesome laughter in the temple dedicated to salutary nonsense has saved them from nervous prostration or brain fag.

And sometimes when we sit listening to a vaudeville programme it strikes us that vaudeville helps an enormous number of people to earn an honest living by cultivating some useful pocket talent. Everything that can arrest the amused or entertained attention of audiences counts. "Nigger minstrels," of course, are almost played out. They grow rarer and rarer. But some one conceived the happy idea of gathering together a group of the old stand-bys—Gorman, Udell, Golden, and Whyte—and having these few surviving experts in blackface humor join together and deliver it according to the old traditions.

So there we are, having negro minstrelsy with an aroma of sentiment about it. The quartet are all either in the sixties or seventies. But their nether limbs—or Billy Golden's, in particular—are still capable of prancing through the exaggerated flourishes of minstrel dances, Charles Whyte's deep bass voice has only lost a part of its sonority, and Gorman and Udell can do their specialties in great shape.

But there is a difference. We pensively perceive the presence of age, the common enemy. There is fun and humor, but it lacks the bubbling spontaneity of youth. We have a personal feeling of responsibility when the old jokes begin to crackle, and look anxiously around to see if everybody is duly amused.

The old fellows do their black make-up in sight of the audience, except one, who is accused by the others of putting it on in advance to hide his wrinkles; the only authentic remedy I ever heard of to cure the brute beasts.

Save one; yes, a lively sexagenarian of my acquaintance, when asked how to cure a wrinkled chin, replied, "The only cure is to cut off your head."

Laura Pierpont has quite an effective offering in "The Guiding Star," which is so outlined as to give Miss Pierpont opportunity to show one character in four widely different phases. In spite of a touch of primness in the Salvation Army girl, the actress showed herself quite expert, and the playlet went well.

A very good act is that of Charles Olcott and Mary Ann, the latter, however, being subsidiary to that very successful amuser "Charlie," who has a pronounced talent for making people laugh. "Charlie" has good material, and although "Mary Ann's" vocal technique seems to be an entirely original device, residing principally in the workings of her curly lips, she is one of those girls upon whose rather piquant countenance every masculine orb is firmly riveted during her part of the act.

Another instinctive comedian is the "Baron" in "What Fools These Mortals Be," which consists of beginning a pretended clumsiness in faked magic and ends in revealing the first-class skill in juggling of both the "Baron" and the "Count."

The pronounced taste of the usual vaudeville patron for song is ministered to by Allan Rogers and Leonora Allen, the latter a gorgeously costumed blonde with an effective soprano, while Allen Rogers sports a good, strong, melodious tenor. The young fellow is not yet absolutely sure of his technique, but he really came through in very good shape with "La donna é mobile."

It struck me that David Schooler does not have quite enough faith in his power to hold his audience by his piano-playing, which is the feature of his act. The dialogue in "Music Hath Charms" is dull. The girls don't look so, but they add to the dullness by a faint-hearted, sloppy delivery; in which fault, by the way, Mr. Schooler shares.

But as a piano player he has arresting qualities. He has temperament and individuality, and he ought to cut out the girls, and the silk curtains, and the inept dialogue, and give us an act of straight piano-playing.

"The Wonder Girl," who, I imagine, founds her act on "Dainty Marie's" specialty, begins the programme with some very excellent and well-received acrobatics, in which she shows herself to be a woman with an iron jaw, while the "Wright Dancers," left-overs from last week, make a brilliant and highly-colored finale, with their really beautiful series of dances.

GOOD-NATURED REPRISAL.

In spite of many assertions through the centuries that women are cats and tigresses, and dealer than the male, the cold fact is that they have tenderer consciences than men. Small, even petty, compromises with their consciences they will make, it is true; I speak of the average woman, who often accomplishes her aims by using European diplomacy; but oh, boy!—man, I should say—think of the gigantic size of yours; your compromises, I mean, not your consciences. If anybody wants to have this assertion proved, just go excursing through the offices of the municipal department in the City Hall, and, though you may not find the men in the old traditional attitude of lying back in an armchair with their heels on a convenient table, you more than probably will find them smoking and talking self-interested politics while on duty. The women will be on the job.

What started me on this text is the serene way in which the conscience, good will, and readiness to work in the feminine make-up is utilized in the school department by male authorities. Not only the various school authorities, but people outside of the educational domain are apt to cast a speculative eye on the two thousand and upwards teachers when there are certain kinds of jobs that need to be done without expense and say, "The teachers can do it."

Do they want several thousand dry nurses to escort the children in the public schools through streets filled with speeding automobiles that they may, in a state of irrepressible excitement, view some great parade, "The teachers can do it." Are cashiers needed to collect money weekly from their pupils that they may have it banked and learn to save, "The teachers can take just a little time from the regular work and attend to it." And so, while coins fall from baby fists and roll into corners, the class work must be suspended indefinitely in order to hunt up lost pennies that are needed to keep the cash account straight, and desperately total up columns until everything is accurate.

Do the dairy men, filled with benevolent desires that mal-nutritioned children should be properly fed, kindly sell large quantities—at a slight but nevertheless peculiarly profitable reduction—of milk and butter to the children in the public schools, it is manifest that it must be the teachers who conduct operations in the schools, count the noses of the children who can rustle up a nickel, keep track of the milk, keep track of the "empties," keep track of the nickel, keep track of the noses. They take time—at considerable unprofitable expense to the citizenry, for they are paid good salaries—to spread butter on bread and dole it out instead of teaching. It seems rather superfluous, one might add, to give the youngsters butter beside the rich milk, as even the children of the rich absorb their bowls of bread and milk without butter; but thus it is done, occasionally causing fits of indigestion to children already overfed, and absorbing an unconscionable amount of the paid time of the educators.

But the teachers are conscientious and good-natured. They are held pretty strictly down to schedule, except for these and other interruptions; and how a conscientious worker who has carefully laid out his work does hate interruptions that scatter schedules to the winds.

The teachers, as I have said, are good-natured. Good will exists between them and the really kindly and well-intentioned staff of officials who run the department. But they permit themselves to joke disrespectfully among themselves about the numerous scattering and unsystematized interruptions to the regular class work that are made by heads of departments and visiting officials.

And finally the teachers staged these private jokes! They really did. They made up a little play in which the kid-teachers were dressed to represent the boys and girls in a class room. The teacher is trying to give a reading lesson; just a plain, ornerly reading lesson; and she continues patiently trying all through the play. But there are constant interruptions, in which their long-hidden and repressed sense of humor had full sway.

They made it a farce, founded on real conditions. And it was roarily funny. The audience shrieked laughter until it wept. Every shot told, as heads of departments came in, one after the other, majestically oblivious of the thwarted reading lesson, which remained unmaterialized throughout this spirited play.

It really amounted to a magnificently efficacious object lesson, administered in the shape of burlesque. For when all's said and done, the stage itself is a classroom, whereon many things are taught.

I would like to see the teachers repeat their skit, and invite all the school officials, who would enjoy the joke as much as any one. For they are good sports, and good-natured ridicule is sometimes a great solvent. And perhaps—who knows?—it might be that they would recognize that, in order to allow the teacher to give a full equivalent for value received, heads of departments and even officials—measurably, anyway—should be placed on a systematized schedule as well as the teaching rank and file; and thus readin', writin', and 'rithmetic would come up breathing.

THEATRICAL NOTES.

Stage Sulphur.

Once upon a time it was considered very improper to have many damns on the stage. One or two might be used in particularly sulphurous passages, and then they made you jump a foot. In other words, you got a kick.

Some producer or other—it seems to me that it was Augustin Daly—would never allow a damn to raise its blasphemous head on his stage, and if there were any in the play he was putting on they were ruthlessly eliminated. But today the Dalys of life are wont to hear their pretty wives and budding daughters carelessly and casually sling around matter-of-course profanity. I note, however, that we are not so habituated to it but that it still creates a laugh when the stage heroine emits a "damn."

And now it is up to Eugene O'Neill, in "The Hairy Ape," to allow his stoker-hero to be realistically blasphemous; and even the unterrified O'Neill dassent do it. He falls back on just plain "hell."

"The Hairy Ape" is a play about a big, elemental giant who is satisfied with his job and proud of his importance as the boss stoker of the ship. "Slaves, hell!" he cries, glorifying himself and his brother stokers; "we run de whole woiks. We're it, get me! All de rich guys dat tink dey're some'n dey aint nothin'! Dey don't belong. But us guys, we're in de move, we're at de bottom, de whole ting is us, see? We belong!"

The talk of this simple egoist is immensely clever, and racy with the argot of our submerged brothers of the slums. But Mr. O'Neill has been called down because he dared not make his "hairy ape" sufficiently realistic in his profanity when he was in a frenzy of rage.

The truth is, however, that although the world has changed, girls are no longer ignorant, language in the women of the upper suckles is more than occasionally unseemly, husbands and wives swear at each other in their domestic wrangles, but in regard to profanity on the stage we still remain conservative, and beyond hell and damn they must not, dare not go.

Shaw's "Methuselah."

Shaw is the only man who has had a trilogy of his plays presented on the American stage. "Back to Methuselah" covers a period of thirty thousand years. In this play Shaw takes the spectator back to the Garden of Eden, where the Serpent is seen loquaciously tempting Eve to disobey the heavenly injunction. Other biblical characters follow; and classical personages in still later scenes vie with each other in brilliant verbosity.

Few writers can hold out as persistently as G. B. Shaw in writing a preface. "Back to Methuselah," however, is a curious conglomeration of the wit and wisdom of his famous prefaces, and of the irresistible humor of the dialogue in the Shaw plays. The author has let himself go luxuriously, and has apparently refrained from considering his pocket in writing his trilogy, for only an advanced theatre would play it.

There is wit, humor, cynicism, irreverence, iconoclasm, speculation, and fantastic inventiveness in the trilogy. But, except as a curio of the theatre, it is extremely doubtful if any sane manager fill ever again pick up "Back to Methuselah" since the directors of the Theatre Guild finished it and laid it down. It is immensely funny, we gather, but it is really futile fantasy, undramatized although brilliant discussion on a variety of topics by various legendary characters—two of whom, by the way, are meant to represent Asquith and Lloyd George—and, in fact, an orgy of argument on every conceivable topic.

Everybody in the play—and most of the everybodies are G. B. himself—talks too much, and to read of this unduly and terrifyingly extensive dramatic—or undramatic—

Still "The Bat."

Not only America, but Europe, is still hungering for "The Bat." It is still on its travels, and has met, apparently, the expectations of Londoners, since its run in the English metropolis, which began in January, continues. It is being run on half a dozen circuits in our own United States, and its two collaborators are apparently doubling the fortunes they already had made in previous successes. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars has been mentioned as the sum that each has already gathered in from royalties on "The Bat."

Naturally there has been a flood of imitations of the piece, for since it has had a meteoric success on two continents, is the biggest go in London today, and will eventually be taken across the Pacific to Australia, the mystery-developing, kick-administering playwright who can make even a pale, diminished wrath of the hit made by "The Bat" is in luck, during this era of hard times.

However, no man knows how abruptly the vogue may die. Incalculable are the vagaries of play-goers. But at present the world is still suffering from the reaction resulting from the terrific excitements of war-time. It is languid, enervated, a little peevish, and rather cross when serious subjects are presented for its consideration.

In other words it wants a "kick," and "The Bat" supplies it to Americans and Englishmen in generous measure.

Highbrowed New York.

It has been the custom, and not so very long ago, either, for newspaper writers in cities outside of the metropolis to state, in rather derogatory accents, that any old thing goes in New York, and that a New York success need not presuppose an artistic success.

And neither should it nor does it. But since the little theatres took a hand it has been made very plain that New York City is not only the centre of theatrical ventures of commercial magnitude, but also that it is the core and heart of theatre activities among those artists who are earnestly striving to do their share in making drama rise to that clearer ether in which it may shine as true, unstained art.

Hence we are continually hearing of ventures there which show courage, and a sort of heroic indifference to the approval or patronage of the dull-witted but money-dispensing multitude. When the Theatre Guild recently put on Shaw's rather unwieldy Methusalem trilogy: when it brought before a somewhat uncomprehending public Andreiev's night-dark symbolical drama: when one pioneer tried the public with the color-organ, another with darky drama, another with a series of artistically produced French plays, still another with Yiddish drama; when European masterpieces that the great American public never would accept throughout the country saw the light in New York: when Stewart Walker set up his Portmanteau Theatre and gave the public whimsically poetic plays; when Eugene O'Neill's sombre and in some cases almost repellent but always arresting, life-reflecting plays were given the needed opportunity on Broadway, and won out, and when, as is the case at present, one may see, at the Neighborhood Playhouse in that many-sided metropolis, a festival based on a poem by Walt Whitman in which is shown to the sound of inspiring music a semi-religious masque or pageant depicting the final triumph of the conception of the brotherhood of man, then we may justly level the pointing finger at blushing New York and say, "You are becoming highbrow."

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Swaraj.

In view of the interested attempts made by Khalifat extremists to whitewash the Moplahs and to minimize the atrocities committed by them, says the Allahabad Pioneer Mail, it is of interest to note that the inhabitants of Malabar at any rate are under no illusions on the subject. At the meeting of sufferers from the rebellion presided over by the Zamorin of Calicut a resolution was passed cordially agreeing with Sir William Vincent in his speech in the legislative assembly that the cause of the Moplah outbreak was Khalifat and non-cooperation agitation, that the administration of martial law was just, humane, and successful, and that if martial law is withdrawn the local government should be given extra authority to protect the people. It is easy for those who live at a distance from the scene of the outbreak to shut their eyes to the brutal crimes committed by the insurgents of the now defunct "Khalifat Kingdoms," but the Hindus of Malabar, who were the victims of those crimes, are not likely to forget them for many years to come. In future, Malabar should scarcely prove a fruitful field for non-cooperation and Khalifat propaganda, and the apostles of "soul-force" would be well advised to give it a wide berth.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

On Monday evening the second production of the interesting Henry Miller season at the Columbia Theatre will be revealed, when Ruth Chatterton will be seen for the first time on any stage in "The Awful Truth," a new American comedy by Arthur Richman.

In this comedy, by one of our promising American authors, the star of "Come Out of the Kitchen," "Daddy Long-Legs," "The Merrie Month of May," and "Mary Rose" is said to have a rôle that fits her talents with the nicety of the proverbial glove, and one which is quite the equal of anything in which she has appeared.

"The Awful Truth" has been written in the realm of high comedy, with its scene laid in present-day New York. To outline the plot in advance of its first performance would be to rob the auditor of that pleasurable anticipation which always precedes the revealing of a worth-while play. Its author, Arthur Richman, will be remembered by many as the writer of "Ambush," shortly to be seen at Berkeley, and now available in San Francisco in its printed form. "The Awful Truth" is a departure from the style of "Ambush" in that it is distinctly a comedy, while the latter play is one of more serious intent.

Heading the excellent supporting cast that is to surround Miss Chatterton is Bruce McRae, last seen here in support of the star in "Come Out of the Kitchen"—and in the modifying rôles will appear Geoffrey Kerr, the young Englishman who made such a favorable impression with Mr. Miller and Miss Bates in "Her Friend the King," Paul Harvey, Annette Westbay, Louise McIntosh, Cora Witherspoon, Bert Leigh, and Elmer Brown.

Elsie Janis and Her Gang will follow the Henry Miller season at the Columbia Theatre. Among other coming attractions are "Mr. Pim Passes By," with Laura Hope Crews in the star rôle, and "Abraham Lincoln," with Frank McGlynn.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Sheila Terry can sing, dance, and act. This season Miss Terry has a new offering. It is called "May and December," and combines an appealing love story with songs and a plot. She is assisted by a cast including William Goodall and Roy Sedley.

Max Fisher and his orchestra from Ziegfeld's Roof are among the foremost exponents of the newer syncopated art in this country. Rubin and Hall offer a "nut" comedy turn called "Ida Wanna." This is not a part of a foreign language. It is a contraction used for comedy purposes only.

Barcklay and Chain are two loose pages from the book of fun. Don Barcklay has made quite a reputation for himself in musical comedy. Del Chain is well known in vaudeville.

Charles Olcott and winsome Mary Ann present a series of song numbers.

Emerson and Baldwin are skillful comedians who offer a bright satire which they aptly term "What Fools These Mortals Be."

Wheelmanship has developed to such a degree that a rider must be a positive wonder in order to attract the slightest attention. Frank Wilson, the "cycling genius," is just this. His control of a bicycle is amazing.

The production of the Wright Dancers, "A Dance Voyage," is one of the great revues of the season.

Comenius

Comenius, "that incomparable Moravian," whose fame was trumpeted as far as three languages could carry it, "became not an American," wrote Cotton Mather, "because he was diverted by the solicitations of the ambassador of another country from coming over to New England to illuminate Harvard College and the country in the quality of a president." This statement of Mather seems to lack corroboration, says the New York Times. At any rate, the incomparable Czechoslovakian, as we should now say, did not come. His reputation as the "founder of educational method" did come, however, and his reforms, especially in elementary education, are now "the commonplace talk of all school conventions."

It is significant that two men, one a Pole and the other a Czechoslovak, Copernicus (Kopernik) and Comenius (Komensky), separated only by the Carpathian Mountains, and by less than a century of time, made contributions to human thought that will ever be remembered as capital events in the history of man's conception of the universe and of the education of children. Comenius was born in the same part of Czechoslovakia as President Masaryk, and they seem to have possessed some fine qualities of patience and courage in common. One competent critic speaks of Comenius as the man whom "we unhesitatingly affirm to be the broadest-minded, the most far-seeing, the most practical of all writers who have ever put pen to paper on the subject of education." His theories have been put into practice in every school, but he announced them to audiences that were often hostile, and with the spirit of a martyr devoted his life to teaching and working them out—wandering, persecuted and homeless, during the terrible Thirty Years War, but never despairing.

John Amos Komensky (who, according to custom, took the Latin name Comenius) was born, son of a miller, Martin Komensky, on the 28th of June, 1592.

Ibn Saud, who ruled the Wahabi tribesmen, from the Hedjaz to the Persian Gulf, has been recognized by the British government as Sultan of Nejd.

GATO GOSSIP

Charlie Greenman gets a word of praise

Charles is no ordinary cigarman. He is a true merchant. You'll find him at 130 Sutter St., the Glass Front Building.

Charlie's methods are worth watching. His trade is select and he knows it. His windows are attractive; his cases show up the goods and he always has what you ask for.

If you buy cigars by the box, Charlie lets you help yourself from your own private humidor.

This year Charlie Greenman is doing extra good on Gatos. His orders come in almost every day. "Yes, there's a reason," says Charles, "it's the new sizes, the better looks, the finer quality. I'm here to supply what my trade demands."

VANITY FAIR.

At last it is out, and now it can be told. The aversion to flapperism is not ethical, but psychopathic, a manifestation of terror on the part of women who have arrived at the parlor period of the "middle-aged spread." Flapperism is not a disease of flappers, but of women of forty or forty-five years, and perhaps of fifty, women who have in their day danced divinely, languished luxuriantly, ruled regally, then married and learned to cook, and then for twenty or twenty-five years ingested too many potatoes, and buckwheat cakes, and hot biscuits; who have seen the men of their choice progress and wax wealthy and important, while their own empire contracted as their hips expanded, and who now fear the loss of all except the alimony, and even the shrinkage of that. We confess this aspect of flapperphobia had escaped us. We confess to having been hoodwinked again by feminine arts. We confess that in common with others of the male persuasion we supposed the antipathy to flappers arose from solicitude for the poor little girl who flapped—for her morals, or her manners, or life happiness, or something that seemed valuable to her. We had been led to suppose that it was due entirely to the maternal interest taken in the flapper herself by the vigilant and conscientious club women of the land. It was not so. The truth has been concealed from the masculine gaze, although the masculine gaze was really at the bottom of it. That procession of ankles which has poured along our city streets until the hicks who used to get cricks in their necks looking up at the tall buildings are growing humpbacked looking downwards really had a sinister significance to a large part of the race, which significance escaped us utterly. Our attention has at last been directed to the true state of the case by a woman writer whose name, now that she has told on so many of her sex, we shall not mention; but her initials are H. B. L., and she reveals the whole mystery in one of the Harper publications.

It appears that the middle-aged spread on Ma's part corresponds to a middle-aged deceleration on Pa's. He has his professional practice going about to suit him, or his branch bank well established, and he becomes interested in golf. The business will really take care of itself pretty much of the time, because he has noticed that the younger men in his employ, while full of respect and admiration and even flattery, get along about as well when he is gone as when he is present, messing into things all the time. So he knocks off early and goes out to the country club. Of course, he takes Ma—at first; but it is not very interesting to her, and she plays rotten golf whenever she plays with him. He is still fond of Ma, just as fond of her as he can be, just as fond of her as ever he was, but he has grown so used to her that he accepts her, like the front steps. She is absolutely necessary to him, more necessary every year, but also she is right there all the time, just like the steps. Like them, again, she has weathered a trifle, and seems to need a little paint, but it is a small matter, and as to doing without her, Pa would as lief cut away the steps and get into the house by the window. He is very much interested in golf and other deliberate things. Some wandering, orphan, bar-room story is about Pa's speed at this time.

Now comes the flapper—out at the country club, or at houses where they happen in, he observes her. She is young, brilliant, impudent, witty, went to college to have a good time and had it, her hair is cut off at the base of her muscular neck, she has about her the sour smell of cigarettes and goes on adding to it, she will dance with you until morning bright and, every so often, bone you for another bite of bootleg. Ma never did any of those things. She would rather have died in the night. For she had been carefully taught that she would lose the great game if she did. Apparently the flapper could stand it not to win; to her it appears that the game is the thing. Like Fox (Charles James, not Richard K.), she seems to feel that the greatest thing in life is to win, but the next greatest is to lose. And it is not the boys she cares most for at present. She has dangled them around her belt in clusters, and shaken them down for all they had to tell her or amuse her with, and now she is going right out after the president of the bank, the director of the railroad, the great surgeon known all over the country, the author of the last ten best sellers, the architect whose office is so full of good and competent draftsmen that he hasn't done anything for ten years except collect his percentages on half the big jobs in town, the editor who can give himself vacations, the lawyer whose clients have learned to curse him and pay him because they are afraid to try and do without him. And the man who has reached that stage of development has usually also reached the stage of deceleration. Him the flapper attacks for her own, for dances, golf, drives, aviation, conversation or tea, and she doesn't seem to care who saw him first. Is he susceptible to flattery at this juncture? Ma has been feeding him well, but has she been flattering him—Ma, who is slightly weathered and needs a little paint? Why, the flapper's wide-eyed baby gaze is flattery enough. Youth springs to attention. The years roll back and are forgotten, the rose glow fills the sky again; and forgotten, too, are the front steps. They will be right there when they are needed. Meanwhile there is the jazz orchestra, and the lights winking from the shining floor; and night, and rhythm, and life! The old bird has flitted into and out of many a trap without springing it, but the salt has been applied to his tail-feathers at last.

What is to be the answer? Well, it seems that if Ma gets flustered and het up, and beads her nose instead of powdering it, and begins to bant at her time of life, and gets a pack of cigarettes and chokes herself learning, and tries to revolutionize herself generally, and offers battle, and makes an awkward mess of it, there are possibilities of trouble. We mind us of a lonely pension by the Arno, if you call it a pension when it is Italian, where dwelt many of the women that had lost—a long and not very sprightly table d'hôte, where faded ladies from America talked of the rate of exchange, and asked whether there was any chance of getting judgments improved on appeal, and whether the best way to get iron into the system was to take it orally or to have it injected in the limb. We may suppose many of them to have been the victims of flappers. But perhaps some of them need not have been. Calmness and understanding are things the flapper has not, which things may frustrate her utterly. There is one bit Ma knows about Pa that the flapper has not learned. She knows about that deceleration, and about how much dancing and joy riding and late hours he can stand. She knows that for any real going, he is already gone. His spring may not be broken, but its steel has crystallized and it no longer turns the clock as once it did. And after Pa has had his taste of speed and finds he can't keep the pace like these young college fellows, he will come back to the front steps and think what an old fool he nearly made of himself. He will be forgiven. But as to the flapper, no! Nor can she be contemplated by the woman of the preceding generation with any equanimity whatever. So, at least, we read the latest revelation on the subject. But there are flappers and flappers. Here in the tonic temperatures of San Francisco Bay there are some flappers fifty years old. It looks incredible, now that we have written it, but we stick to it. With fine boots, graceful drapes, permanent waves, a trifle of Spanish rouge, a veil with dots large enough to confuse the eye and a hat with a flat brim and a rake to it like the sticks of a pirate craft, they are here. Long may they flap. But they know too much, and are really the dangerous kind.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A Canadian was inquiring of a British statesman the reasons for creating peers. The Britisher mentioned, among other public services, the donations to party campaign funds. "Oh, I see," said the Canadian. "Over in America we send such men to jail, but in England you give them a title."

In a lecture to the Beckenham College for Women Students recently Lord Haldane declared that an enlightened democracy would insist on an enlightened press. He said that after a long, tiresome journey he had wished to see the news, and asked a newsboy for a paper. "Football or otherwise?" asked the boy. "Otherwise," said Lord Haldane. "And so," he added, "I got the day's racing results, and tips for the day after."

There are a few people left in favor of prohibition—Commissioner Yellowley of New York, for example. According to the commissioner the champions of beer and light wines remind him of a certain professor. A lady arguing with the professor said, "Dr. Dash says that beer and light wines are injurious. How do you account for that?" "Easily," said the professor. "Dr. Dash is a total abstainer, and can therefore neither think straight nor reason correctly."

Joseph Leiter was comparing prohibition subterfuges with that of a young colored girl, who was rushed to the hospital with a broken jaw. She was very evasive in her explanation. Finally she was pinned down to the admission that she had been hit with an object. "Was it a large object?" inquired the surgeon. "To'able large." "Was it coming fast?" the surgeon persisted. "To'able fast." "Was—" began the surgeon, but here the girl's endurance snapped. "Oh," she burst out, "I was jes' natch'ly kicked in de face by a gemman friend."

Lord Balfour, who as every one knows is a golf enthusiast, often plays on the famous St. Andrew links in Scotland. According to a story in Mr. Andra Kirkaldy's "Fifty Years of Golf" a player on the ancient links asked his caddy if he often carried clubs for famous men. "Lots o' them," replied the caddy, and after naming a few more or less distinguished persons mentioned Mr. Balfour and said that he had a close acquaintanceship with him. "Just what do you mean by a close acquaintanceship?" asked the golfer. "This," replied the caddy, pointing to his legs. "I'm wearin' a pair o' Mr. Balfour's troosers."

Private Abraham Washington Jackson was on sentry duty his first night in the new camp. In the cold early morning hours the lieutenant-colonel showed up. "Halt! Who all dere?" bellowed Private Jackson. "Officer of the post." Followed a painfully long silence while the sentry racked his brain for the proper retort. Finally the officer of the post lost all semblance of patience. After a period of vehemence he became articulate enough to say, "Why don't you say something? Are you going to let me stand like this all night?" "Nosuh," answered the private. "No, indeed, suh! At ease!"

An English duchess had been owing her milliner a long time. The money was sorely needed, and after the bill had been repeatedly ignored, the milliner finally sent her little daughter to collect it. "Be sure to say 'Your Grace' to the duchess," said the anxious mother, and the child gravely promised to remember. When, after long waiting, she was ushered into the presence of the duchess, the little girl made a low courtsey, and then, folding her hands and closing her eyes, she said softly, "For what I am about to receive, may the Lord make me truly thankful." The quick-witted duchess flushed as her eyes rested on the wistful little face of the child who had so unconsciously rebuked her, and without delay made out a check for the amount due the milliner.

When Kitchener of Khartoum returned from India to England by way of Japan and the United States in 1910, efforts to interview him began as soon as he set foot on these shores. His lordship abhorred publicity and detested reporters. Their enterprise resulted in nothing more exciting than K. of K.'s reiterated assertion that he thought the United States an amazing country—was fascinated by its people, charmed with its scenery, and bewildered by its vastness. When Kitchener's train reached the old Wells Street station at Chicago fifty South African war veterans waited to welcome their former commander. Wearing a gray tweed suit of becoming shapelessness and a floppy golf cap, Kitchener descended the Pullman steps and was surrounded. The main thing was to get an interview and a good picture. "Sorry, can't talk," snapped Kitchener; "against orders, y'know—soldier—on duty—that sort of thing—photograph? Lord no! Can't really—sorry."

y'now—awfully." Nate Meissler, the photographer, was horrified. Something must be done. Kitchener was already starting for the gate with his escort. Meissler waddled after him. "Lord!" shrieked the fat little camera man, "Lord! Oh, my lord! Oh, dear lord! Just a minute, lord!" He chanted it like a prayer. Kitchener stared coldly at his pursuer. Suddenly the hard Kitchener lips quivered, and—epochal event!—Kitchener laughed. He literally shook. "Curious chap, that!" remarked his lordship to the escort as he strode away, still chuckling. "That's no way to address a lord," some one said to Meissler. "You should have called him your lordship." "Lord Ship or what the hell," grinned Nate. "I didn't get his name, but I got four plates." And that is how a Chicago newspaper happens to possess the only laughing picture of Earl Kitchener in the world.

An engineering company that was laying a railroad in Alaska had occasion to employ a number of foreigners on grade work. In some cases, these men through their own ability or through the scarcity of more competent workers became sub-foremen, who were instructed to take charge of their particular part of the job in case of the death or illness of their immediate superiors. It was from one of these that the company received the following telegram: "Boss is dead. What to do?" "If you are sure he is dead, bury him. Will send another boss," wired back the company. The next day they received a telegram from the obliging alien: "All right, buried him. Made sure he was quite dead. Hit him on head with shovel."

Samuel Pepys.

I read the stuff he wrote,
I said I liked him heaps,
But how they grabbed my throat
When I first called him Pepys!

I learned to read his books,
Quite good, they say, his rep is,
But there appeared cold looks
When I first called him Pepys!

I thought I had him cold,
This name the crowd accepts,
But, no! they say, that's old,
His name is really Pepys!

Pepys, Pepys, and Pepys too;

I do not give a damn.
You call him what appeals to you—
But I shall call him Sam!

—Paul McKinney Palmer in Judge.

A Memory.

Mary wore a little skirt
Indeed that swept the walks,
She did not camouflage her face
Nor did she roll her sox.

And yet the men in Mary's town
Classed her among the chiques,
For Mary wore that little skirt
In eighteen-ninety-six.

—Penn State Froth.

A story told by a certain bishop to illustrate the moral that murder will out is as follows: A family whose pet parrot took sick sent the bird to the servants' quarter to be nursed. After some weeks the parrot was returned to the drawing-room, cured. But always after the sojourn in the nether regions the bird would exclaim upon hearing a bell, "Oh, let the devils ring again."

From Ivan the Terrible

An historic episode of Ivan the Terrible has just been repeated in the reign of Nicholas Lenin, according to the New York Tribune.

At the time when the Republic of Novgorod flourished, before it was destroyed by Ivan the Terrible, there was installed in the square of the city a bell, called "the bell of justice." Every citizen who thought himself wronged had the right to ring it, by night or by day, to call the people for help, but the penalty of death was inflicted on the citizen who rang it without sufficient reason. One night when the bell rang the people who came running found under the penthouse that sheltered it a blind old horse which, ill-fed and famished, nibbled at the rope.

The master of the animal was sentenced to treat his horse better. And the same year Novgorod fell into the hands of the Russians. Ivan the Terrible, knowing this story, had the bell transported to Moscow, where it was hung up in the tower bearing his name. And the Czar swore that whoever should ring it to demand justice in his name would cause him to rise from his tomb to keep his oath. For five centuries the bell was silent. But recently it was tolled at midnight.

The Red Guards who rushed to the place found a famished blind old horse gnawing at the rope. All knew of the legend and fled in terror.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

Deaths of J. R. Hanify and E. A. Christenson.

John R. Hanify and Edward A. Christenson, with Captain Petter Andersen, Hanify's pilot, were drowned in the Bay some time during the night of Saturday, May 6th, through the wreck of Christenson's yacht, the Quart, off McCoy's Landing, Hayward. The Quart had started on a cruise of the Coyote Point Yacht Club to San Mateo Saturday afternoon, and failed to return. Airplanes, tugs, a Coast Guard crew, and launches manned by friends of the missing men engaged in a search of the Bay for them early Sunday morning, and about 11 o'clock the dismantled craft was discovered with the bodies of Hanify and Christenson entangled in the rigging.

Both Hanify and Christenson were well known in San Francisco. Both were constructive and successful business men, directors of the Olympic Club, and leaders in yachting, for which they had done much. Hanify was head of the important lumber and shipping firm, the J. R. Hanify Company. In 1915, with his yacht Westward, he won the gold cup offered by King George V of Great Britain for the Panama-Pacific International Exposition races. Christenson was a director of the San Francisco Savings and Loan Society and of the Anglo and London Paris National Bank, president of the Sudden & Christenson Lumber Company, and president of the Shipowners and Merchants Tugboat Company. It was owing largely to his well-directed energies that this city had an abundance of lumber for reconstruction after the earthquake and fire of 1906.

The Disciple of the Devil

Many years ago a peasant of the community Z, near Lemberg, emigrated to America, says the New York Tribune. Recently he returned to his village, his pockets stuffed with dollars. He drove to Lemberg to have his dollars changed. His departure became known in the village, and the very same night there was a knock at the door of his house. His wife opened and recoiled in terror. On the threshold stood what appeared to be the devil himself, covered with a shaggy hide, with glowing eyes and spreading a penetrating sulphurous odor. He pushed the peasant woman into the room, locked the door, and after rattling his chains and giving forth infernal sounds began to tell her what he wanted. He threatened the woman with all the torments of hell if she did not hand him immediately all the money brought home by her husband from America.

The woman swore solemnly that her husband had taken all the money to Lemberg to have it exchanged for Polish marks. Thereupon the "devil" searched all the chests and shrines, and not finding anything, declared that he would come again tomorrow, when he hoped that the man would be back. She had to swear not to tell anybody of the occurrence or he would take her with him to hell. The woman, trembling, awaited the dawn. In the morning a gendarme chanced to come to the house. He found the woman in a state of terror and after long urging got from her the story. The gendarme promised to help her. She hid him in the room. At midnight there was a knock at the door. This time the gendarme opened and tore the mask from the devil's face. He started back horrified, for before him stood the village judge, who, in this way, tried to get quick and easy possession of the dollars. The gendarme delivered his superior to the district court.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Rise of Aphrodite.

Lo, one who sails upon the moonless deep
Skirting the land, and hears th' unceasing roar
Of plunging billows and the distant sweep
Of wind-tossed surges on the winding shore
And the remote, low voices of the waves
Where all night long the broken water raves
And bellows through reechoing ocean caves.

No light upon the main but starlight dim
And through the solemn night no other sound
Upon the sea breeze, save that ancient hymn
The wind doth breathe through every stop and round

Of the great sea—the monotone which swells
Eternal as the surly sigh that dwells
Within the galleries of ocean shells.

But now from out the horizon wild and dark
Stealeth a strain—a dream of melody,
As, slowly wafted, comes a white-sailed bark
With noise of flutes across the listening sea,
Bearing to Paphos, island of all flowers,
Foam-born Idalia, led by dancing hours
And oared by Tritons from their coral bowers:
With tinkling harps and choral strains divine Charming to sleep the billows in its way:
Lit up with soft celestial lamps that shine
Where round the prow the green-haired Nereids play;

And shedding through the startled realms of night
A lambent, flushing, shifting radiance bright,—
A far-extended haze of amber light:

And borne by sea winds o'er the midnight deep
With rosy gleam and music breathing low,
Glides like a dream across the ocean's sleep,
Casting on the black waves a moment's glow;
Then, passing into darkness, leaves once more
The sweeping surges and the billows' roar
And shimmering startled loneliness before.

—Henry A. Beers in "Poems."

Confession.

I think, by God! It is no lie;
I shall go dreaming till I die!
There is no love so real to me
As the cold passion of the sea.
There is no little, wind-swept town
By harbors where the roads go down,
Or headland gray that sits and sips
The cup of ocean at its lips,
And gazes at the far-off ships—
Or tree or house or friend so real
As visions and the dreams I feel.

No—not the windy, vaultless arch
Where all the white stars flame and march,
Nor water at the river fords
Like horses mad among the swords,
Or oaks that lean from winter storms;
These only give my vision forms.

Away! White hands, I will not take!
And kissing mouths that cry, "Awake!"
For you I have no grammarcy;
So leave me by my lotus tree,
To dream and gaze into the sky
Where red suns wither up and die,
I know! I know! I do not lie!
I shall go dreaming till I die!

—Hervey Allen in "Wampum and Old Gold."

Flamborough Head.

Evening, like a gentle sister
Steals across the harbour, trimming
Her moon-lantern where the brimming
Seas and smouldering skies meet.

Gliding onward, trailing sweet
Lilac while her fitting feet
Skim the waves, the fields of wheat
On the cliff. . . .

Now she is stooping

To the poppies gaily trooping
Like the red-capped little people . . .

Higher than the hills and steeples
To the dream-clouds she is heaping
Lilac, lilac, till the sleeping
Stars are awakened there and, peeping,
Creep out softly, like the day's end.

On the cliff path lovers wend
Laughing ways through Paradise . . .
By the moon's light in their eyes
Evening, like a gentle sister,
Knows they walk in Paradise.

—Thomas Moulton in "Down Here the Hawthorne."

The Dying Philosopher to His Fiddler.

Come, fiddler, play one tune before I die.
Philosophy is barren, and I lie
Untouched now by the plagues of all the schools,
And only silly fiddlers are not fools.

Bring, then, your bow, and on the strings let be,
In this last hour, merely the melody
Of waves and leaves and footfalls hazardous,
Where crafty logic shall not keep with us.

The patient fields of knowledge did I sow;
I have done with knowledge—for I nothing know.
Wisdom and folly set their faces hence,
And in their eyes a twin intelligence.

Only your notes may quick again the keen
Tree-shadows cut upon the paddock's green,
The pools where mirrored branches are at rest,
The heron lifting to her windy nest.

And these are things that know not argument;
Come, fiddler, play; philosophy is spent.
Out of my thought the chiding doctors slip,
And you are now the only scholarship.

—John Drinkwater in "Seeds of Time."

The French Academy of Sciences has been officially informed that Switzerland is preparing to commemorate the centenary of the great French mechanician and watchmaker, Abraham Louis Bréguet. Born in Neuchâtel in 1747, member of the Institut and Bureau of Longitudes, he died in Paris in 1823. The astronomical and nautical instruments invented by Bréguet were noted for the perfection of their workmanship. His improvements in watches included the use of rubies in pivot holes. He fled to London during the Reign of Terror, but returned after the ninth Thermidor. On the occasion of this centenary the Swiss Council of State will hold next year an international competition for chronometers in the observatory of Neuchâtel.

Mother—No, Willie, for the third time I tell you that you can't have another nickel. Willie—Darn it, I don't see where Pa gets the idea you're always changin' your mind.—Judge.

Master—Joseph, how's the weather this morning? Joseph—Rather warm, if it happened to be January; decidedly cool if we were around the 30th of July.—Paris L'Illustration.

The Boss—Young man, have you ever been to college? Applicant for Position (in blushing apology)—Er—well, yes, sir, I have—but it was only a small college and I stayed only three months.—Life.

Wife—Dear John, mother was so pleased with all those nice things you said about her in your letter. You see, she opened it by mistake. Hubby—Yes, I thought she would.—Baltimore American.

"Can any one tell me where the home of the swallow is?" asked the teacher. There was a long pause, finally followed by this response: "The home of the swallow is in the stummock."—New York Times.

"My son Hiram is just crazy to go to college and study pharmacy," said Mrs. Wheatley. "It may be all right," replied Mrs. Corn-tassel, "but I think the place to study it is right here on the farm, where ye git practical experience."—Livingston Lancet.

To a maker of movies an earnest lady who wished to "uplift" the screen suggested a version of Shakespeare's farce, "The Taming of the Shrew." "Not on your life!" boomed the magnate. "I've lost enough money already on animal pictures."—New York Globe.

"Squire," asked Constable Slackputter, the well-known sleuth of Petunia, "what would you do to a feller that confessed he was driving his Ford at the rate of forty-five miles an hour?" "Fine him for exaggeration!" snapped old Squire Peavy.—Kansas City Star.

Comedian—Poor old Harry got the bird properly last night. They hissed him right off the stage. Then I came on. The audience quietened down and listened to my first number with every attention. Then, just as I was giving 'em my patter, blowed if they didn't start hissing old Harry again.—Punch.

"You say that this man has a grudge against you?" demanded the judge. "Yes, your honor," replied Bill the Beggar. "When I was blind he used to steal the pennies from my cup and when I was a cripple he'd run down the street with my box of pencils." "Anything else?" "Yes, your honor. Once when I was deaf and dumb he shot off a fire-cracker underneath me."—American Legion Weekly.

Those Portraits of Sts. Peter and Paul.

An interview with the archaeologist Lanciani has reduced to more modest terms the discovery which was acclaimed by the newspapers as that of the authentic portraits of St. Peter and St. Paul in a hypogeum (underground chamber) recently brought to light near Porta Maggiore, Rome, according to the Manchester Guardian.

The hypogeum was accidentally discovered during the digging operations for the construction of a garage for the municipal taxicabs in Viale Manzoni, near Porta Maggiore, and belongs to the second half or end of the second century. That means that a good many years had passed since the death of the two Apostles. To talk, then, of authentic portraits, in the sense of portraits taken from life, is ridiculous; and at the most one might talk, as Senator Lanciani said, of portraits in the painting of which consideration was given to other previous portraits, perhaps direct and, if one will, of oral tradition, still sufficiently fresh in the second century in a place like Rome, where the Apostles Peter and Paul had been so popular.

All this does not mean that the excavation of the hypogeum and its pictures constitute an unimportant fact. On the contrary. This sepulchre has in some respects absolutely new characteristics, profoundly interesting, whether from the archaeological or from the historical aspect of Christianity. It consists of a series of rooms hewn out of the tufa and covered with roughcast; the largest of them is about five yards wide, and the others not much less; they are joined by passages and stairs; and there are new cells made in the walls, to be used as tombs in the ever-increasing enlargement of the sepulchre which occurred with the passing of time.

The so-called portraits are in the largest room. There are eleven figures, which when the room was intact must have been twelve, clothed in white tunics. They are standing, barefooted, with volumes in their hands or in the act of speaking. Amongst these are the two supposed figures of Peter and Paul, corresponding to a great extent with the traditional figures.

THE ARMSTRONG RADIO FEED-BACK.

By a strange coincidence one of the most remarkable decisions in patent litigation ever recorded was handed down last week by the United States District Court of Appeals in the case of the Armstrong Radio Circuit, says the New York Tribune. The decision came just at the moment when the latest application of the circuit resulted in the development of a service which has gripped the public enthusiasm and taken the country by storm. Stripped of its legal and technical verbiage, the decision of the court, which is final, means that no transatlantic telephone conversation can be carried on without the Armstrong principle, nor can any of the big radiophone broadcasting stations now sending music nightly through the ether operate without using the Armstrong patent. Even the modern multiplex forms of wire telegraphy and telephony must use the Armstrong method.

Major E. H. Armstrong was a pupil of Professor Michael I. Pupin, director of the Marcellus Hartley research laboratory of Columbia University. Of the achievement of his pupil, Professor Pupin says:

"This decision refers to one of the most important inventions, if not the most important, in the wireless art. It is the invention of employing in connection with an audion a coupling which enables a local battery to contribute its energy to the amplification of a signal received in a wireless station. The contribution obtained in this manner from the local battery or the local source of energy may be made as large as we please within certain definite limits. Armstrong was the first to employ this coupling, or, as it is called, the 'Armstrong feed-back circuit,' and he did it while he was still an undergraduate at Columbia University.

"The invention enabled him to make another most important step in wireless telegraphy, and that is the construction of a vacuum tube oscillator. When the feed-back circuit energized by the local source contributes more than a certain definite amount then the system of circuits becomes an electric oscillator, oscillating at the perfectly definite period which depends upon the inductance and the capacity of the controlling circuit. By varying either the inductance or the capacity, or both, we can produce any period of oscillation between a few periods per second and many millions per second, and the oscillation once established maintains its pitch indefinitely.

"It is a generator of electrical oscillations, maintaining its pitch with a degree of accuracy never before obtained by any apparatus constructed by man.

"The importance of the feed-back circuit in the reception of wireless signals and the importance of the electrical oscillator, not only in wireless telegraphy, but also in wire telegraphy and other departments of applied electricity, can not be overestimated."

The United States and Spain furnish the greater part of Mexican immigration. In 1921 the immigrants from this country numbered 10,825, and from Spain 7691. Of Japanese there were but 345. The Germans numbered 1805, Englishmen 1522, Frenchmen 1181, Italians 1073, and Chinese 2388.

A leather manufacturer stated that during 1920 the leather trade of England undoubtedly passed through the greatest cataclysm in its history.

Higher Budget and Lower Tax Rate.

Taxpayers of San Francisco will regard with lively interest, if not with vast relief, the report of the finance committee of the board of supervisors recommending a budget of $24,741,758 for the year 1922-23, and suggesting that it may be met by a tax rate of $3.42 on the $100, instead of $3.47, the rate for 1921-22. Here is a tentative reduction of 5 cents on the $100, and if no new paternalistic programmes are forced on us, and no fresh importunities for needless development are yielded to, the reduction may be held. It may even be increased, although one hesitates to excite cardiac trouble on the part of the taxpayer by suggesting it. The budget is higher than the one for the preceding year by some $274,998. With the rate a little lower there is a discrepancy to be bridged. The gap is spanned by an increase of assessments, which is, of course, the only way in which it could be spanned. The appraisers have turned up a great deal more personal property, in the shape of stocks of merchandise, money in bank, and the like, and in addition there has been much real estate improvement to bear its load of sorrow. Thus the relief to the taxpayer is more apparent than real; and that is true of the whole community, for the payment of taxes does not stop with the person from whom the money is collected—he passes it on, and eventually it is spread over all society in the subtle form of a higher cost of living. Taxation is a common burden, not merely an annoyance of the rich. What really is needed is a reduction of the cost of government, even at the expense of a contraction of some of the extra functions government has taken on of late. To that proposition we do not expect instant assent, but it is no less true. Perhaps by this time next year those business men constituting the finance committee, Messrs. McLeran, McGregor, and Rossi, who have done well thus far, may see their way to cutting things down in reality. Meanwhile, there is a chance of an even larger reduction in the proposed rate. The assessor's office is farther along in its work now than it was at the end of June last year, and has a stronger force of appraisers in the field. A year ago, when the finance committee called on the assessor for an estimate of probable increase in the assessment, it was told it might expect about $6,000,000 more property on the assessment rolls; and in the outcome the right figure proved to be $15,000,000. It may be that the interval between this time and the third or fifth day of July, when the assessment is complete, will show an even better basis for the levy. If so, it is to be hoped that the finance committee will have enough backbone to protect the city against more demands, however formulated, and give the public the real benefit of the broadening of the taxable foundation.

Ex-President Wilson and Senator Reed.

Who's Who and What's What in the national Democratic party? Whoever is interested in these queries will do well to keep a watchful eye upon the State of Missouri, where a senatorial primary election is dated for August 1st. Senator Jim Reed, Democrat and incumbent, is a candidate for reelection upon a record of opposition to the League of Nations and to pretty much everything else typified by the name of Woodrow Wilson. On the negative side Mr. Reed's position is positive, but it is not so clearly defined affirmatively. Perhaps it comes nearer to old-fashioned Democracy than to anything else, and this ought to be a taking platform in Missouri, where the Democratic mind, long tutored in the school of after-the-war politics, mainly runs in the old grooves.

Now comes Woodrow Wilson, a very sick man, but by no means a dead one. An invalid he is, but he retains a passionate desire for power and an equally passionate desire to punish his enemies within his party. In Mr. Wilson's opinion the policies of his administration reflect the principles and aims of the Democratic party, and he has put it up to the Democrats of Missouri to sustain his position. He has written three letters on the subject of the senatorial primary in Missouri, in effect serving notice upon the Democratic party that he is its prophet and that any brand of Democracy that does not bear the Wilson label is fraudulent. He has stated his position unequivocally, leaving no room for excuses or alibis in the event that the Democratic voters of Missouri reject his counsels. He has staked his all on the outcome. If Reed is nominated in the face of Mr. Wilson's opposition the latter may be regarded as politically dead and buried. He assures this result by the boldness with which he has defined the issue.

Mr. Wilson's latest letter, addressed to a former governor of Missouri, denounces Reed as a marplot and asserts that his nomination would be fatal to the party, not only in the State of Missouri, but broadly throughout the country. He does not in express terms say that such a result would turn the party over to the machinations of its late candidate, Mr. Cox, whom Mr. Wilson despises, but the intimation is plain. What effect Wilson's plea will have upon the Democrats of Missouri nobody can now foretell. Certain factions of the party within the state, other than the Wilson faction, are unfriendly or lukewarm toward Reed, but one thing is certain, namely, all who resent Wilson's effort to perpetuate his authority in the party are likely to turn to Reed's support.

Mr. Wilson's hold upon party good-will has been a good deal shaken by recent eccentricities. Take the case of his fierce assault upon Senator Reed on the score of the latter's course in connection with Federal Reserve legislation. Wilson's letter was positive to the degree of direct abusiveness. Reed's reply was a squelcher in the form of a letter addressed to him by the ex-President immediately following senatorial action upon Federal Reserve legislation, thanking him (Reed) for his course therein. It was a case of lapse of memory on the part of a sick man, an angered man, a man cherishing an unquenchable hatred of one who at various times and in various ways—notably in the matter of the League of Nations—had defied his authority. Then there is the other very recent instance in which he put his late secretary and personal friend, Tumulty, in a hole. Mr. Tumulty told at a Democratic dinner in New York that he brought from the President a certain message. Mr. Wilson in a public statement declared that he gave Tumulty no such message and that, as read before a dinner of Democrats, it misrepresented his views. Again lapse of memory on the part of a sick and peevish man. Tumulty bowed meekly to the rebuke of his late chief, but there is not the slightest doubt that he was right and Mr. Wilson was wrong. Mr. Tumulty has said to confidential friends that immediately following the interview with the ex-President, in which the latter had given him the message, he wrote down the phrases then fresh in his mind. Despite his denials, Mr. Wilson did give to Tumulty the message as delivered. It was not until he discovered that what he had said was interpreted as friendly to Governor Cox that his denial was made. It is a case where charity is due to one whose mind, whatever it may once have been, is no longer what it was.

These several incidents justify a plain statement concerning Mr. Wilson's physical and mental condition. There is no doubt on the part of those who have fairly intimate knowledge of the man in these recent months that his mind shares the infirmities of his body. He is still partly paralyzed. Helped to his feet, he can stand with the aid of a cane and walk a very short distance in halting fashion. His mind at times appears to have something of its old quality, at other times his mental processes are fitful and uncertain. Mentally as well as physically he is a sick man. This is understood generally at Washington, manifestly so by Senator Reed. In his opening speech in Missouri last week the latter took the right line. Much, he said in effect, must be pardoned in one whose labors, whether rightly or wrongly directed, have left him in a state where passions and vanities blur his mind and nullify his capacity for judgment.

Again the Bonus.

The field marshals of the bonus raid are fertile in new projects. No less than three varied proposals have been developed within the last month. In turn they have been presented to the President, but there is no indication that he has altered his position, which is that any measure providing a bonus shall also provide means for paying it. The latest plan to be urged is an issue of bonds based on our foreign war credits, accompanied by a proposal for immediate cash payment of something like fifty dollars per man. While differing from the original project, this plan does not avoid the original objection excepting in the fact that it measurably reduces the sum to be paid immediately in cash. Against this proposal there stands in full force every argument against the original project. Figure as they may, proponents of the bonus are not able to point out a way by which the government can pay out to the ex-service men the sum of five billion dollars, less or more, without imposing upon the country an enormous financial burden, with imposition of new taxes and a prodigious incubus upon business. Furthermore, the new proposals, like that which came before, fail to meet the arguments that the scheme is fundamentally wrong in that it has no support in equity and that it has been devised wholly in political interest—as a bribe for the votes of ex-service men. Discussion in and out of the public press is all to one effect, namely, that the bonus project is a raid pure and simple, lacking support in any argument founded in equity or in presumption of welfare to the presumptive beneficiaries.

That a bonus bill in one form or another will finally work its way through both branches of Congress seems probable. The House has already passed the original bill and it is said that a poll of the Senate exhibits commitments sufficient for the passage of this bill or some other by that body. Nobody has devised a plan in conformity with the President's requirement that in providing a bonus means of payment shall also be provided. The prospect is that in one form or another a bill will be put up to the President defective at the point of his demand. In that case it may be expected that the President will veto it. In view of the many forms of pressure that will be put upon him, this will call for a firm head and a firm hand. Mr. Harding, we believe, will find in his sense of responsibility and in his own character the strength to do his duty. And if he does so he will establish himself as the strongest man who has sat in the executive chair since Grover Cleveland—perhaps even since Abraham Lincoln. If the President shall fail to meet this demand in the spirit of his duty it will, in the judgment of the Argonaut, destroy the Republican party. A political organization in full control of the government, yet not strong enough to protect the country against a colossal raid in behoof of a class and in obvious concession to merely political exigencies, will not deserve, as it will not have, confidence and support at the hands of the American people.

Genoa.

Fundamental differences of necessity and purpose between England and France have brought the Genoa Conference to collapse. The situation is easily defined. For her welfare, indeed for her very life, England must have markets—markets in which she may buy raw materials to feed her mills and in which she may sell their product. Three or more million English workmen are idle and supported by doles from the government. Property is being taxed to the point of destroying its value. The country is suffering for that which would be supplied by revival of trade with Germany and Russia.

On the other hand, France wants protection. Fear of her neighbor beyond the Rhine has been bred into her. Her imperative need is security. In a sense she is better off than England, for she can sustain her own people from her own soil; but in another sense she suffers by comparison because of her exposed position toward an embittered and revengeful enemy whose potential powers are vastly greater than her own.

A course towards Germany and Russia that would serve the interest of England would, in the view of French statesmen, be fatal to the interest of France. The two national purposes are so essentially different that no line of compromise and of unified action could be found. Further study and fresh negotiation may discover a workable policy, but we doubt it. England can not much longer carry on without the markets of Germany and Russia. Under ideals and motives that are inbred, France will not abandon her fears.

A Duty of Government.

It is a law of logic that in order to arrive at a right conclusion you must start from a true premise—or else have the extraordinary luck of committing two mental blunders, one of which will offset the other; an alternative which happens so seldom as not to be worth considering. Going wrong in our political thinking does not mean mere violation of form, nor even running counter to some old sage's precept. It involves worse consequences than merely getting out of line with what has been taught. Fallacious political reasoning entails, wherever it becomes the basis of action, evils to all society, whether those evils are apparent on the surface of things or not. When in order to serve some temporary need we depart from good sense and from propositions that social experience has proved to be true, losses result. Sometimes those losses are of such a nature that they can be foreseen, and the electorate refuses to sanction the experiment with its property or its social and commercial arrangements. That is why Mr. Bryan has never succeeded in making himself President. His devices for improving the world have embodied too much enthusiasm and feeling, and too much of a special nature rather than those general and objective realities on which alone policy can safely be based. No mere opportunist ever accomplishes permanent good for society, no matter to what extent the evils of his compromises with the pressing exigency may be veiled in the endless confusion of events.

In labor troubles, local officials in this country have been too much given to temporary expedients that promised an easy peace. They have compromised authority and rightness of principle to placate faction and to quiet noisy minorities. They have been willing to apply general principles as long as no strong private interest opposed, but few of them have been sufficiently conscientious, sufficiently strong of will and purpose, to enforce proper policy against privilege fortified with a formidable bloc of ballots. Hence our recurrent concession to, and compromise with, the solid little minority of bad labor leaders demanding exemptions from the law of the land and from the operation of the only policies on which society can safely conduct its affairs. Recognizing the privilege of law-breaking in order to win private wars against employers, a privilege never openly asserted but nevertheless exercised in one industrial dispute after another, has grown to be almost a habit of municipal officials, and almost expected by helpless city populations; whose best interests are not served, but sacrificed, by such injustices.

That is a Chinese attitude. The history of China for thousands of years has been one compromise with wrong after another. Things are never fought out to a finish, but settled at a price for the sake of present peace. Compromise with evil for any excuse whatever always contains the seeds of future war. It is a mere postponement of trouble. Watterson said of the tariff that it would never be settled until it was "settled right"—and that is true of all things political. The population of China today groans under intolerable burdens of maladministration and evil custom consciously adopted at some time or another as a concession to force and menace. The rampant graft, the wholesale squeeze of the comprador class, the national institution of highway robbery which has a tendency to grow under the creative powers of more gifted bandits into widespread rebellions, all these things, and more of which they are but the symbols, have their roots in this weakness of public policy, and will probably take generations to eliminate. China long will suffer for compromising with evil instead of fighting things through. And every time we in this country adopt a policy of temporizing with a wrong we shall merely be selling the future for the present, and the account will be heavy to pay. We have been doing it in our labor policy ever since the outbreaks of the "Mollie Maguires."

Hence there is refreshment, encouragement, and a renewal of hope, in the recent statement of the Chicago chief of police, Charles C. Fitzmorris, on the current labor troubles of that city. He has the right conception of his duty and of his relations to the public whose trusted servant he is—the whole public, not merely the organized-labor part of it. He is not fussing about psychology or some other fad in police work. If he has any strange, wild sociological theories he is keeping them to himself just now. He is not charging crime to social conditions. He has been in a serious position, his city threatened with destruction by dynamiters, probably his own life in danger. In the midst of it he utters fundamental truth about the duty of government under such circumstances, and he does not seem to care who dislikes it. He says: "The function of every municipal police organization is to enforce the law and preserve order. As an arm of civic government it has no concern with the merits of the disputes between employers and workers, but it can not under any circumstances ignore destruction of life and property."

That is as true as gospel. It will be true as long as government exists that is worthy of respect. When it ceases to be true, government worthy of respect will cease to exist. There can not be special privilege in a free country. There can not be license to commit crime and carry on private war. Compromising with evil men in order to secure "industrial peace" is never worth while, for there is no such thing as permanent industrial peace, and when we make such concessions we are paying for goods that we can never get. The labor question will not be clarified until officials recognize themselves as impartial umpires. It is to be hoped the Chicago police chief can hold that attitude; and that our local authorities may, in the two strikes now going on in San Francisco, follow his example.

Our Demoralized Police—and Why.

The statutes of California and the ordinances of the City and County of San Francisco taken together supply a complete code of instruction and authorization for the San Francisco police force. It would seem that the police department, even individual policemen, should be able easily to determine what are the obligations, the duties, the restrictions, in the work of policing the city. But as often happens there is wide divergence between theory and fact. Since time out of mind the police department of San Francisco has taken its orders, not from the Law, but from the mayor's office—sifting down through the board of police commissioners, the chief of police, the various captains of police, etc. Our police department has been controlled in its operations by a series of "policies," each reflecting the attitude of whoever happens to be mayor, or to be more accurate, of whoever happens to "run" the mayor. Law has less to do with the direction of our police department than the arbitrary will of somebody who officially or through arrangement holds himself superior to the Law.

Within recent memory we have had a variety of "policies" governing the course of the department. Mayor Schmitz employed the police as a club in promotion of the sordid interests of the Ruef régime. Mayor Taylor made use of the police to support the Spreckels-Phelan syndicate. Mayor McCarthy made the police an adjunct to the laborite régime. Mayor Rolph has used the police variously through a series of temporary policies. At times it has served his interest with organized labor, at other times it has served to promote his political ambitions. More recently its activities have seemed to be under the direction of conservative influences, and common gossip has supplied adequate explanation therefor.

In brief the laws defining the obligations, duties, and restrictions of the San Francisco police have had less to do with department administration than the will or the interest of somebody, officially or otherwise, in control of the city government. Members of the police force from the chief of police down to the youngest patrolman have been drilled under a system tending to destruction of individual character. The surprising fact is, not that some members of the police force are corrupt, but that any of them should be honest. For these twenty years and more the police department of San Francisco has been in effect a school of demoralization.

Within the last two years prohibition has had its part in corrupting the police force. To men ready drilled in contempt of the Law it has brought new temptations, and it is not surprising that in many instances those employed to enforce the Law have been active agents in its evasion. It is too much to expect of a man, schooled in illegality and corrupted by sinister practices, to resist opportunities of extraordinary profit when presented to him under conditions of practical security against exposure.

Indiana.

Further study of the returns of the Indiana primary, with analysis of the conditions back of it, tend to nullify the impression that the result is a species of "backwash" against the Administration. It is to be remembered that Mr. Beveridge has a record of twelve years' notable service in the Senate and that in the period of his retirement he has made a really great contribution, in his "Life of John Marshall," to the historical literature of the country. His book has in truth augmented his old-time popularity in a state that prides itself upon the achievements of its literary men. It is further to be borne in mind that Beveridge is an engaging personal figure and that he made a brilliant campaign, largely through astute appeal to the women of Indiana. For something more than two years he has gone up and down the state addressing women's clubs and whatever other social organizations invited him; and as an attractive speaker he was invited everywhere. It is also to be remembered that Beveridge had the support of Senator Watson, not so much because Watson is a friend of Beveridge as because he is and has long been an open enemy of Senator New. The result has given the nomination to Beveridge, but it has also wrested from New and given to Watson the political control he has long desired.

Further explanation comes from a very capable observer, Mr. Benjamin S. Dean of Jamestown, Indiana, in a letter to the New York Herald. "Those," declares Dean, "who see in the triumph of Beveridge repudiation of the Harding administration are not looking through the eyes of the Indiana farmers and business men." He proceeds to explain that while Senator New has in the main been a friend and supporter of the Harding administration, he has at one point, and a very important one, stood in opposition. Mr. Dean's interpretation is to the effect that it was largely as a proponent of the bonus raid that New incurred the resentment of multitudes of taxpayers and voters. "Indiana," declares Mr. Dean, "is for the President in its faith that he will veto the bonus project; it is against any man who has been active in promotion of bonus legislation."

It is still further to be borne in mind that Beveridge in his senatorial candidacy stood before the people of Indiana as a pronounced and ardent friend of the Administration. Specifically, he took ground against the agricultural bloc and against any other factional organization in Congress tending to weaken the party system. Nobody, if we may believe Mr. Dean and other observers, voted for Mr. Beveridge with the idea that his success would imply a slap at the President or other than a contribution to the strength of the Administration backing the Senate.

In the Democratic primary former Governor Ralston was given the nomination. Ralston will have the support of Tom Taggart and his very formidable organization, and his canvass will not lack for funds. The campaign is sure to be a warm one, with the chances of election largely in Beveridge's favor.

Editorial Notes.

Mr. Gifford Pinchot, in general statements widely circulated throughout the country, and Mr. La Follette in the National Senate, continue to preach that the true method of conserving oil is to let it remain untouched underground. But after the manner of most theorists these propagandists are either ignorant of the facts or in blind devotion to their preconceptions ignore them. Oil underground refuses to separate itself into compartments with the boundaries of surface survey. Adjacent to all the navy reserves, which the propagandists insist must be left untouched, are privately-owned lands. Wells put down on these private lands will draw from the same pools that underlie the navy reserves. According to the Department of the Interior, which ought to know what it is talking about, privately-owned wells in California have depleted the common pools by hundreds of millions of barrels.

An immediate consideration relates to the navy oil reserve in Wyoming, known as the Teapot Dome. It is not alleged that privately-owned wells are depleting the pool under the navy reserve, but it is submitted by the Department of the Interior that private wells presently will be doing so. The department declares that its investigations clearly demonstrate that the Teapot Dome pool can be drained by adjacent privately-owned wells. Senator La Follette, setting himself up as an expert, declares that the department is in error. Further, he asserts that if the Teapot Dome pool shall be drained the government should make the private operators give back the amount of oil they take from under the navy reserve. Just how this may be determined nobody is able to see. Mr. La Follette is seconded in his contention by former Governor Brooks of Wyoming, who insists that the navy reserve in the Teapot Dome district shall be left untouched. Mr. Brooks' position is not difficult to understand. He is the president and chief owner of a company whose lands and wells adjoin the Teapot Dome. Under the Pinchot-La Follette policy of "conserving the oil underground," Governor Brooks' company would profit vastly, since the pool under Teapot Dome would, if Interior Department experts are to be believed, flow into Mr. Brooks' wells.

The so-called Water and Power Act, to come before the voters next November, is not an "act," in the sense of being a statute, within the power of the legislature to modify or repeal if it should prove unwise. It is a proposed amendment to the Constitution, whereby a board not yet appointed, and hence as yet unknown, is to be given a blanket power of attorney to dispose of the vast sum of $500,000,000 OR MORE, in any way which it may decide will promote the production and sale of electric energy. The OR MORE is not a figment of the imagination, nor an invention of evil persons bent upon discrediting a sublime and beautiful effort to introduce the blessings of socialism in California. It is distinctly provided for in the proposed amendment, which reads: "Bonds of the State of California, not exceeding the sum of five hundred million dollars (unless additional bonds are duly authorized by law), may be issued and sold from time to time to carry out the purposes of this article, and the full faith and credit of the State of California is hereby pledged for the payment of the principal of said bonds as the same mature, and the interest accruing thereon as the same falls due." The italics are ours. In other words, the issue is not to exceed five hundred million dollars, unless it shall exceed it—a sort of limitation characteristic of the entire scheme.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Kind Word.

NEW ORLEANS, May 4, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I can not refrain from expressing my appreciation for the splendid editorial entitled "The Faith of France" appearing in the Argonaut of April 29th. It is so absolutely true and impartial, so clearly and forcibly written that you deserve thanks from every man who wants to get the right view of the French situation. You can not write too much on this and other topics, such as the bonus, etc.

Very truly,
A. L. VORIES.

Prosperity Threatens the Railroads.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 11, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Gustav Lindenthal, one of the greatest and best informed transportation engineers and bridge-builders in the world, has recently recorded it as his considered opinion that: "One could not find the money today to build a transcontinental railway. I doubt if the money could be found to build a new five hundred miles anywhere in this country." Five hundred new miles in this whole broad land of ours! We have 3,026,789 square miles of territory inhabited by 105,000,000 of people served by 250,000 miles of railway, but thirty-five and a half inhabitants and one-twelfth miles of railway to each square mile of territory we own. From 1910 to 1920 our population increased by more than 14 per cent.; our railway mileage and facilities by but 6.4 per cent. What does it mean?

The Wall Street Journal stated on March 9th that since 1908 railway freight and passenger needs have been expanding at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. During the same period roadbeds, equipment, and facilities have expanded at the annual rate of but 3.7 per cent. This translates itself into the appalling fact that the railway transportation supply is at least 46.2 per cent. behind the country's normal needs, and growing steadily less.

With five hundred new miles as the extreme possible increase for the entire country, California's proportion would be seventeen and a half miles. From 1910 to 1920 California's population increased 44 per cent. and its railway mileage 8 per cent. This leaves California's transportation supply in 1922 more than 40 per cent. below its normal needs; and if Mr. Lindenthal is right, all the increase the railways can possibly finance is .00021 per cent.; for that is what seventeen and a half miles come to. In 1921 grapes rotted in our warehouses, and fruits, vegetables, and other produce decayed where they grew. This was in part due to want of a market, but in other part to the railways' physical inability to supply cars in which to reach the markets. Ask any grape grower in the San Joaquin or fruit producer in the Sacramento Valley whether last year he was able to get all his produce to its market, or if he did, if he got it there in good condition or what he lost because he couldn't.

It is said that the great Sutter Basin project, which Ogden Armour is supposed to be backing, gave away most that it produced in 1921 because it could not get cars to get it out. If Ogden Armour can't get cars to transport his produce a "fat chance" Bill Jones or John Smith has of getting them. As Octavius Roy Cohen would phrase it, "The cars just nacherally aint." If with the business of the country on a basis of 60 per cent. of normal as it is today the railways are only just able to furnish transportation for it, when we get back to 100 per cent. normal, as we are slowly but surely doing, what is going to be the transportation answer?

Every transportation sharp is yelling that a return to prosperity under present transportation conditions will mean disaster. Their outcry will be as a gentle summer zephyr when compared with the anguished future shrieks of the shippers unless transportation facilities are improved before prosperity gets off at the old home station. In the meantime the railways seem to be preparing an alibi by claiming it isn't their fault and is somebody else's. It is rather reminiscent of Bill Devery's description of "the man who fought with a feather duster."

Who cares whose fault it was in the past? Who cares whose fault it is in the present, unless the knowledge will help solve the problem? That is beside the question. The railways can't build and equip if they can't finance; if they can't finance, they can't build and equip. The answer is the same from whichever way you take it. It lets the railways out, but it doesn't solve the problem, and the problem must be solved; for,

Transportation means prosperity.
Transportation means development.
Transportation means life itself.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Chess is one of the oldest, and probably the most scientific, game known. Its origin is mysterious. It was mentioned in Oriental literature about 2000 B. C. It was originally played in India, Persia, and Arabia, and subsequently was known in Spain and Western Europe. It is said that it was invented in order to teach the art of war.

It is estimated that there are 3064 languages in the world and more than 1000 different religious sects.

VOICES FROM THE PRESS.

A FAMILY QUARREL.

(Philadelphia Public Ledger.)

There is neither rhyme nor reason in the Democratic effort to read into the Indiana Republican primary results a slap at the Harding administration. The Beveridge-New contest in Indiana was a family quarrel, but the head of the Republican household was in no way involved therein. The Harding administration was not an issue nor was any act of the Administration dragged in as an issue. Former Senator Beveridge did not attack the Administration or the Harding policies. Nor did he assail Senator New's close personal affiliations, his David-and-Jonathan friendship with President Harding, that goes back to the President's own happier senatorial days. "Newberryism" was mentioned in the campaign, but hardly more than mentioned. In fact, the Indiana Republican primary seems to have been an issueless kind of struggle, unheated, without great bitterness, devoid of shocks and clashes.

NOT A NIGGARDLY NATION.

(Washington Post.)

A statement compiled by the government authorities throws much light upon the government's attitude toward its defenders. The figures are brought up to April 1st, and show that a total of $1,996,260,634 has been appropriated for the welfare of soldiers and sailors of the late war, in such items as family allowances, insurance, hospitals, vocational training, etc. The appropriations for the fiscal year 1923 are $406,038,842 for these purposes. Thus the United States is expending more than $1,000,000 a day for the welfare of "the boys." . . . The number of former service men receiving vocational training is 108,200. The average received per month by each man is $115. Other figures on wounded and disabled men are as follows: Approximately 30,000 are now in hospitals. The total number wounded is 208,526. The total number discharged for disability is 251,916. The government is paying compensation on 50,420 death claims and 156,539 disability cases. The amount paid last month for this compensation was $10,340,000. The government is paying insurance on 134,550 death claims and 6299 disability claims. The amount paid in war risk term insurance last month was $8,454,069. The commuted value of war risk term insurance allowed by the government is $1,326,985,835.

LENIN RECOGNIZED.

(Mobile, Alabama, Register.)

Why recognize the red autocracy of Lenin, which, compared with the mild lash of Czarism, has scourged the Russian people with scorpions? Samuel Gompers said last Sunday in Chicago: "I can think of nothing that would constitute a more needless and base betrayal of civilization than American recognition of Bolshevik tyranny." It is the truth. Lenin, once a socialist, posed later as a communist. But he is neither. He is an absolutist, a Genghis Khan, using socialism and communism to clear the way by destruction for that terrible one-man dictatorship of the world, of which he has long dreamed. He has enslaved Russia politically to a degree unknown in Romanoff times. He is persecuting even the revolutionary socialists. What he has done to Russia economically is indicated by the fact that by way of small change his printing presses are now printing 1,000,000-ruble notes.

KLANISH KONFUSION.

(Spokane Spokesman-Review.)

"There isn't a secret service in the world as large as this one; thousands of eyes are watching your every move," boasted Harry Graham of Boston, an international organizer of the Ku Klux Klan, in a public debate with the mayor of Kansas City. The speaker attempted to justify the secretive methods of his organization with the flimsy excuse that "secrecy was essential to the preservation of Christianity in the early days of Roman persecution." If the Boston organizer had a rudimentary sense of humor he would see the absurdity of comparing the Roman Empire with the United States, Christianity with the Ku Klux Klan, and the persecution of the early day Christians with the long forbearance of the American people and the law in dealing with a night-riding secret organization.

BETTER ATHLETES.

(Galveston Daily News.)

Is the present generation of athletes a superior one? Do the contenders in sports today utterly outshine those that have gone before? The Kansas City Star says that the first national championship broad jump record was 17 feet 4 inches. It is more than 25 feet now. In the first national contest at pole-vaulting a man named McNicol came out best with 9 feet 7 inches. Foss now sails over the bar at 13 feet and better. The shot-put record started out at 32 feet 5 inches. They can throw it more than 50 feet now. Against the old high jump mark of 5 feet 5 inches is the new one of 6 feet 4 3/4 inches. And so it goes. One record falls after another and new records go up in their places. Says the writer in the Star: "The differences in the athletic performances of the boys of today, as compared with the lads of yesterday, is so great that it unquestionably proves a marked superiority of the present generation."

WHERE LIQUIDITY COUNTS.

If people would regard a central bank's discount rate in the light of a protective measure, there would be less misunderstanding about the workings of a central banking system. It is the money market which forces up the Federal Reserve discount rate. . . . The following reference is made to a statement in the Washington Times: "If you wanted to gamble on the Stock Exchange yesterday you could borrow money for the purpose at 3 per cent., the lowest price in a long time." Here again is an instance of failure to appreciate values in the money market. The matter of liquidity in the class of collateral dealt with in Wall Street, and that which the farmer has to offer, is conveniently ignored. If the farmer's collateral could be turned into cash in five minutes he would be the most favored borrower in the country.

IT'S A NATIONAL EPIDEMIC.

(Asheville, North Carolina, Citizen.)

Baseball enthusiasm in the hearts of fans who would not be discouraged has won baseball for Asheville this season. Oates Park once more will be the afternoon arena for the contending teams, and Asheville's will be there. Tired business men will once more find incentive to speed up the morning's work so that they may find psychic recreation and rejuvenation in the grandstand and the bleachers.

NEXT TO THE BEST DRAW.

(Kansas City Star.)

Look at John D. Rockefeller, and Chauncey M. Depew, and Joe Cannon. They never relied on the draw. A careful man can do better these days with a sensible diet, and a few demonstrated rules of health, than the draw ever did for anybody. Bud Ballew might have lived to be as old as any of those named if he hadn't believed his draw to be the quickest going. Probably it wasn't anything better than a 1910 draw and look what science has done since 1910! The lesson is that no draw is quick enough when it meets a quicker. Probably it's better and safer never to cultivate a draw at all. If a man wanted to live long he should learn how to live, not how to draw. That seems to be the lesson of Bud Ballaw, the man who had the next to the quickest draw in Wichita Falls.

SUPPLYING THE WRONG THING.

(Byron Times.)

The $500,000,000 water and power measure, known as the hydro-electric act, is misnamed. It should be called the hydro-phobia act, for its bite is vicious and poisonous, and may infect the whole state. If all of the forty-eight states of the Union were to be saddled with a half-billion-dollar bonded debt, tax free, it would amount to $24,000,000,000, greater than the debt the United States incurred in the world war. Reduction of taxation is what is needed—not more bonds, particularly bonds to help disrupt the privately-owned public utilities of the state, in which tens of thousands of private citizens have invested hundreds of millions of dollars, and which for thirty years have been developing power ahead of the requirements of the state.

MORE TAXES, LESS PRODUCTION.

(San Mateo Times.)

You can not exempt half the property of the state from taxation without doubling the burden on the remainder. You can not put the state in competition with private business and expect individual industry to exist. The people of California would do well to consider these points before being led into such a scheme as the state water and power act.

A NON-PARTISAN LEAGUE METHOD.

(Hanford Morning Journal.)

The work of gathering funds with which to finance the campaign to vote into the Constitution of the State of California, if possible, the "California Water and Power Act," which is to be submitted in the November election, is being prosecuted in this immediate territory by agents of the organization which is fathering the measure.

Farmers, business men, and citizens in general are being solicited for "donations" of $10 each—a membership fee, in the proper sense, in the organization which is formed to put the amendment over at the election next fall.

It seems curious that a campaign fund should be necessary to put across legislation which proponents loudly declare is "in the interest of the people." It only shows that the proponents realize that they have a measure which is sure to prove unpopular with "the people" who are vitally interested, and funds must be raised with which to lure votes through campaign publicity, speaking, and field agents over the state.

A "SELLING NATION."

(New York Times.)

The head of the International Mercantile Marine Company, home from a business trip to Europe, was naturally asked for his views about shipping and trade. Mr. Franklin stated them in a few words. The merchant marine situation would not improve, he thought, "until goods are moving again to all parts of the world." The great business of America, in his opinion, is moving products to outside markets. The reason is that "we are a selling nation and the United States should do everything possible to stimulate its selling powers abroad." This has often been affirmed, but never in a more sententious manner. On our exportable 10 per cent. surplus in both manufactures and raw materials, American prosperity is recognized by all impartial economists to depend. If there is no enlarged foreign trade, there will be no revival in shipping, no recovery of industry, no stimulus to agriculture.

KEEPING THE UNIVERSITY TOGETHER.

(Sacramento Union.)

Little surprise will be felt at the announcement of the California Agricultural Commission in New York last week that it will recommend that the College of Agriculture be maintained as an integral part of the University of California.

The policy of a centralized administration of the College of Agriculture and of a close affiliation with the academic departments of the university has been that which has been wisely followed from the inception of agricultural teaching at the university. It has been a policy commended by good sense and based on sound principles of economy. It has been the policy followed by the principal state universities of the country and is the goal toward which those states which have separate institutions are now progressing.

All these facts and many more supporting the present plan now in effect in California were known before the present investigating committee was created. There has been little evidence which it could gather on its long journey which could change them, but the committee has undoubtedly listened to much substantial testimony on the prevailing California plan and why it should be retained.

The decision of the committee should set at rest the agitation which every so often develops to dismember the university of its agricultural activities. Critics of the methods employed at the farm school and at Berkeley have without any intervening reason believed that an independent agricultural school would end all the difficulties and immediately give to the farming interests the things which they wanted. The committee's investigations should now set that idea at rest. It should help these critics to the more useful course of making a thorough investigation of the deficiencies that present themselves and bringing an insistent but dignified pressure to bear to have them remedied.

The university has always shown a disposition to meet more than half way any movement for revisions and changes backed by people who knew what they were talking about.

A TREATY-BREAKING TREATY.

(Manchester Guardian.)

Article 260 of the Treaty of Versailles reserves the rights of the Reparation Commission over German property confiscated by Russia, and even if these rights are called academic their renunciation by Germany in favor of Russia appears to constitute a technical breach of the treaty. Apart from this, the Germans, who have only got Mr. Lloyd George to thank for the holding of the Conference at all and for the first big constructive effort to bring order to the economic life of Europe, have made his task enormously more difficult and, for the moment at least, done their best to convince him that he made a mistake in asking their cooperation. It is not a question of gratitude. On balance of the last three years Germans have nothing to be grateful for. But one would have supposed that they realized by this time that, however unaccountably to themselves, distrust of their good faith is still one of the chief obstacles which Mr. Lloyd George has to overcome, not so much in France as at home, in his policy of conciliation. That distrust has been needlessly intensified. Unless the Germans can show that the Russo-German Treaty was not intended to stab the Conference in the back it will be so much the longer before they are invited to and act.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Mrs. Mary Blaker is the only woman town crier in England.

The only women in Ulster's new governing body are Mrs. R. S. Chichester and Mrs. McMordie.

The tallest couple in Europe are Mr. and Mrs. Van Droyse, who measure 7 feet 6 inches and 7 feet 3 inches respectively.

Miss Agnes MacPhail is the first and so far only woman to become a member of the Canadian House of Parliament. Miss MacPhail was elected to represent the constituency of Southeast Gey in Ontario.

England has a new American-born peeress in the person of the Countess of Gosford, whose husband only recently succeeded to his family title and estate. The countess was Mildred Carter of Baltimore. Her father is a partner of J. P. Morgan.

Lord Willoughby de Broke, who has just written a laudatory introduction to Captain Anthony Ludovici's "Defense of Aristocracy," is one of the most reactionary of Tories, and declares that when the Conservative party returns to office its first duty will be to give back to the House of Lords the power that was taken from them before the war by Lloyd George and Asquith.

A Bavarian burgomaster of the name of Rimmel has published in a local paper an announcement declaring that he will not officiate at any marriage ceremony whenever the prospective bride can not show herself adept as a housekeeper. Burgomaster Rimmel has actually refused to marry a certain couple because the bride confessed to ignorance of cooking. This is going eugenics one better.

To the list of envoys France has sent us must be added the names of André Chrevillon, author and critic, and Maurice Donnay, dramatist. Peaceful business brings them, for as members of the French Academy they come in connection with the Molière tercentenary. M. Donnay is a Parisian, born in Montmartre, and destined by his parents to enter the office of a civil engineer. He revolted, and became a dramatist.

Mlle. Anne Stepanek, sister of Dr. Bedrick Stepanek, the Czechoslovakian Minister to the United States, is the world's first active woman diplomat. Although not officially credited to the State Department as a member of the legation staff, she is her brother's right-hand man, sitting daily in his office and discussing with him all important matters. She is recognized among the diplomatic corps as a real authority on European politics.

Some English observers think the end of this Parliament will see the withdrawal from active participation in public life of Lord Curzon, the "Purple Emperor," as he was once called by a British wit. He represents the traditions of the old European chancelleries, and while he possesses a mind both broad and acute, and is profoundly learned, his learning is of the old school and he continues to think in the old terms. He is apt to be rather didactic and to take himself seriously. The newer diplomacy does not appeal to him, and he is suspected of lacking a due sense of humor.

Brigadier-General Herbert M. Lord, who is slated to succeed Charles G. Dawes as director of the budget, is at present chief of finance of the army. The prospective chief of the budget began life in the newspaper world and later broke into Republican politics in Washington, serving as a clerk on various committees of the Senate and the House. His career as financial director began during the Spanish-American war, when he was appointed paymaster of the volunteers, May 17, 1898. He became a lieutenant-colonel in 1913, a colonel in 1917, and brigadier-general in 1919. In 1918 he had been appointed assistant to Major-General Goethals with the title Director of Finance. He was awarded the D. S. M. for his services during the late war. Brigadier-General Lord is a Republican and a Christian Scientist.

Dr. Lee De Forest, the inventor of the audion bulb, familiar to radio fans, made his now famous discovery more than twenty years ago, and actually patented his audion in 1907, when radio was still undreamt of by the world at large. Dr. De Forest received his training at the Sheffield Scientific School, Yale University. Incidentally, he is the son of a parson and the grandson of a parson. His father was president of Talladega College, in the Alabama town of that name. Having served with the Yale battery during the Spanish-American war, De Forest went to Chicago and got a job in the Western Electric Company's experimental telephone laboratory. There he became interested in wireless telegraphy, and in 1900 left the Western to do independent research along wireless lines. Dr. De Forest is in his forty-ninth year and may well have a future that will coincide with wireless development in our age.

Luigi Sturzo, or Don Sturzo as he is usually called, is a Sicilian priest who has lately begun to play an important rôle in Italian politics. However, he is not a newcomer to administrative work nor is he a political novice. In the seminaries at which he studied he threw himself into politico-social work, creating diocesan committees and unions which were later used as a framework for the Christian Democratic party. In 1905 this party was officially disapproved of by the encyclical of Pius X and Don Sturzo set about to build a new party, which was finally crystallized in 1919 in the Popular party. The new political machine made a triumphant entry into Parliament in the first post-war election in Italy, but the party was the Christian Democrats re-organized and renamed. The purpose of the two was the same—to advance the cause of the church. The success of the Popular party is universally known. But not every one knows the power of the Sicilian priest who is its secretary. It is said that ministers frequently go to him to submit their proposals before introducing them in Parliament, and that if he sought to be unfrocked he would become an Italian Lloyd George.

OLD FAVORITES.

"The Days of 'Forty-Nine."

You are looking now on old Tom Moore,
A relic of bygone days;
A bummer, too, they call me now,
But what care I for praise?
For my heart is filled with the days of yore,
And oft I do repine,
For the Days of Old, and the Days of Gold
And the Days of 'Forty-nine.

Refrain—

Oh, my heart is filled with the days of yore
And oft do I repine
For the Days of Old, the Days of Gold,
And the Days of 'Forty-nine.

I had comrades then who loved me well,
A jovial saucy crew:
There were some hard cases I must confess,
But they all were brave and true;
Who would never flinch, whate'er the pinch,
Who never would fret nor whine,
But like good old bricks they stood the kicks
In the Days of 'Forty-nine.

There was Monte Pete—I'll ne'er forget
The luck he always had.
He would deal for you both day and night,
So long as you had a scad.
He would play you Draw, he would Ante sling,
He would go you a hateful blind—
But in a game with Death Pete lost his breath
In the Days of 'Forty-nine.

There was New York Jake, a butcher boy,
That was always a-getting tight;
Whenever Jake got on a spree,
He was spoiling for a fight.
One day he ran against a knife
In the hands of old Bob Cline—
So over Jake we held a wake
In the Days of 'Forty-nine.

There was Rackensack Jim, who could outroar
A buffalo bull, you bet!
He would roar all night, he would roar all day,
And I b'lieve he's a-roaring yet!
One night he fell in a prospect hole—
'Twas a roaring bad design—
For in that hole he roared out his soul
In the Days of 'Forty-nine.

There was poor lame Ches, a hard old case
Who never did repent.
Ches never missed a single meal,
Nor he never paid a cent.
But poor lame Ches, like all the rest,
Died to Death at last resign,
For all in his bloom he went up the flume
In the Days of 'Forty-nine.

And now my comrades all are gone,
Not one remains to toast;
They have left me here in my misery,
Like some poor wandering ghost.
And as I go from place to place,
Folks call me a "Traveling Sign," Saying, "There goes Tom Moore, a bummer, sure,
From the Days of 'Forty-nine."
—Author Unknown.

El Canelo.

Now saddle El Canelo! the freshening wind of morn,
Down in the flowery vega, is stirring through the corn;
The thin smoke of the ranches grows red with coming day
And the steed is fiercely stamping, in haste to be away.

My glossy-limbed Canelo, thy neck is curved in pride,
Thy slender ears pricked forward, thy nostrils straining wide;
And as thy quick neigh greets me and I catch thee by the mane,
I'm off with the winds of morning,—the chieftain of the plain!

I feel the swift air whirling and see along our track,
From the flinty-paved sierra, the sparks go streaming back;
And I clutch my rifle closer as we sweep the dark defile,
Where the red guerrillas ambush for many a lonely mile.

They reach not El Canelo; with the swiftness of a dream
We've passed the bleak Nevada, and San Fernando's stream;
But where, on sweeping gallop, my bullet backward sped,
The keen-eyed mountain vultures will wheel above the dead.

On! on, my brave Canelo! we've dashed the sand and snow
From peaks upholding heaven, from deserts far below,— We've thundered through the forest, while the crackling branches rang,
And trooping elks, affrighted, from lair and covert sprang.

We've swum the swollen torrent—we've distanced in the race
The baying wolves of Pinos, that panted with the chase;
And still thy mane streams backward at every thrilling bound,
And still thy treasured hoof-stroke beats with its morning sound.

The seaward winds are wailling through Santa Barbara's pines,
And like a sheathless sabre, the far Pacific shines;
Hold to thy speed, my arrow, at nightfall thou shalt lave
Thy hot and smoking haunches beneath its silver wave.

My head upon thy shoulder along the sloping sand,
We'll sleep as trusty brothers, from out the mountain land;
The pines will sound in answer to the surges on the shore
And in our dreams, Canelo, we'll make the journey o'er.
—Bayard Taylor.

AN AMERICAN SOLDIER.

Stirring Narrative of Individual Valor Presented in Cowan's "Sergeant York and His People."

This is a hard book to review. If you have much patriotic sentiment you can't read it without choking; and the dictionary has no words to tell it in. All historic feats pale beside the facts narrated here, including the notable accomplishment of the late Mr. Horatius at the Bridge. An American of Americans, of a type from which the mass of the population seems in some danger of departing, contributed to victory the greatest act of valor performed by any private in any of the armies in Europe during the late war—such, at least, is the judgment of Marshal Foch, and he was in an excellent position to know.

Sam K. Cowan has told about it in language as simple as the epic deserves, after going to live for awhile in the home village of the Tennessee paladin. The story bears every mark of authenticity and first-hand knowledge. Here are, in the life, "Sergeant York and His People"; the one a part of, and not to be understood without, the other.

A year or so ago the writer of this review sat in the auditorium of the West Side Y. M. C. A., in New York, and heard the sergeant tell his story, because, he said, that is what we were there to hear, and he had a plan for which he wanted our help. He spoke, with the unaffected dignity of a man learned in deeper things than books will ever tell, of the need of his people for schools, the birthright of all of us, but denied these particular Americans by the poverty of the mountains. The man who had a right to more personal pride than Alexander and Wilhelm Hohenzollern combined was more modest than a schoolgirl; that is, an old-fashioned one. Some soft mountain slurs were in his speech, but otherwise he talked like home folks anywhere. He said: "They offered me a lot o' money to go on the stage, but I felt that would be sellin' myself and I wouldn't be able to help my people so much if I did."

He killed twenty-five Germans and took 132 prisoners, and "did in" a machine-gun battalion, which is a unit planned to give combat to a regiment—so as things equal to the same things are equal to each other, there is his measure—and he prayed while he was doing it because he is religious and doesn't like to kill men; and he just regarded it as part of a morning's work, and after taking a receipt for his prisoners proposed to go back and plod along to the end of a perfect day. But they had other uses for him.

Protected by his act, his regiment went ahead and cut a railroad that was feeding a strong salient, and the salient collapsed. Strategists have analyzed his exploit, and found it flawless, yet he had no council of war to help him plan it—just a rifle and an automatic pistol, and the wits under his strawberry hair. This is how closely he could figure under fire:

When the Germans found they could not "get him" with bullets, they tried other tactics.

Off to his left, seven Germans, led by a lieutenant, crept through the bushes. When about twenty yards away, they broke for him with lowered bayonets.

The clip of York's rifle was nearly empty. He dropped it and took his automatic pistol. So calmly was he master of himself and so complete his vision of the situation that he selected as his first mark among the oncoming Germans the one farthest away. He knew he would not miss the form of a man at that distance. He wanted the rear men to fall first so the others would keep coming at him and not stop in panic when they saw their companions falling, and fire a volley at him. He felt that in such a volley his only danger lay. They kept coming, and fell as he shot. The foremost man, and the last to topple, did not get ten yards from where he started. Their bodies formed a line down the hillside.

What sort of people bred him, and in what environment? His line can be traced back about 100 years only, to North Carolina, but the names are Anglo-Saxon ones, beginning with a maternal ancestor named Conrad Pile, who was a "long hunter" like Daniel Boone, and who, at a spring where he had killed a deer in the mountains of Tennessee, made camp, and afterward took up land, opened a store in his cabin, and started the tiny village of Pall Mall; in the Valley of the Three Forks o' the Wolf. His followers and companions called him Coonrod. Says Cowan's narrative:

Old Coonrod was a man of Big Business for his time; one of force of character who dominated his community and who "sized his man" by standards that were peculiarly his own.

A man would come to him to buy a "poke" of corn or flour, or for a favor. To the surprise of the stranger the favor might be over-granted or the corn given without cost; or, upon the other hand, he would be brusquely dismissed without the least effort at explanation. Unknown to the stranger the condition of his "britches" had probably given him his credit rating with Old Coonrod, for he held that patches upon the front of trousers, if the seat were whole, were decorations of honor, showing the man had torn them doing something, going forward. But, if the front of the trousers were good and the seat of them patched, no dealings of any nature were to be had with the dictator of the valley, for to Old Coonrod it meant the man "was like a rabbit; he could not stop without sitting down."

The Yorks, also, came from North Carolina. Uriah York taught school, after the crops were laid by; and at the outbreak of the civil war he slipped over the Kentucky line, seven miles northward, and joined the Union forces. His son, William York, married Mary Brooks, descended from old Coonrod Pile. It must have been a eugenic union; perhaps as much so as though Daniel Webster had married Mme. Blavatsky. Alvin C. York was born in a cabin beside the spring where Coonrod made his first camp in Tennessee. His proud little mother was speaking of her third of eleven children:

"Alvin is jes' like his father," she said. "They were both slow to start trouble, but ef either one would git into hit, they'd go through with the job and there'd be a-burtin'."

It is fortunate that this hero did not come from the far West, of growing wealth and opportunity; fortunate that he was neither California miner or vaquero, nor Texas cowboy; these parts do not need so much advertising, and his exploit has done more to call attention to the needs of the people of the Appalachians and the Cumberlands than anything that has ever happened. Cowan's book says of their early advantages:

Raised in nature's school, they are masters of its non-elective course. They know by the arc the baying hounds make the size of the circle the fox will take and where to intercept him. They can tell by the distance up the mountain's side where the dogs are running whether the fox is red or gray. They know by the sound a rock makes as it is dropped into the stream the depth of the ford. They have even a classical finish to their woodland schooling and they find a pleasure in noting that the bullfrog sits with his back to the water as the moon rises and faces it as the moon sets.

They know little of books, except the book of the outdoors, and their grammar is quaint, some of it going back to Beowulf. But a great educator said of it: "I would rather a boy said 'I seed' when he had seen something, than 'I saw' when he had not." At Pall Mall the gathering place is John Marion Rains' store, where the conversation consists largely of a keen and grim sort of banter. The mountain wit jumps like lightning, but expresses itself slowly in words; they are a word-stingy folk, suspicious of the talkative world. Says Cowan's narrative:

Over any gathering at the store a pall of silence descends when a stranger rides up. If the newcomer is a new drummer unfamiliar with the ways of the mountains, if he comes imbued with the belief that the voice with the smile wins, and talkatively radiates his individual idea of fellowship and democracy, one by one his auditors silently drop away. To them, an insincere, a false note of democracy has been struck.

You see, the ancestors of most of them came from Buncombe County, and they know what buncombe is. But after our author had lived with them awhile they grew careless and let him see them as they were, and here is the sort of conversation that cross-fires from the top of cracker boxes and nail kegs and the long counter where even now at evening Sergeant York sits and swings his legs and chats with his kin and neighbors:

Many a time John Marion is compelled to retreat behind a grin when in a lull "a shot" is taken at him, and his smile is his acknowledgment that he can not be expected to add up a charge-slip and at the same time defend himself against a care-free man upon a keg of horseshoes.

But the storekeeper is never taken by surprise at the badinage of his patrons. One afternoon after a long wait and another day in the valley seemed sure to pass with no unusual incident, an old fellow arose from one of the chairs, stretched himself, and said:

"John Marion, I want a shift o' shirts. Else I got to go to bed to git this-un washed."

The storekeeper laid out several of dark color:

"Here's some you can wear without change till the shirt falls off."

"That's right, John; gimme one that won't advertise that the ole woman's neglectin' me."

Another was uncertain about the size of a pair of overalls for his boy:

"Dunno, John Marion; one tight enough to keep the bees out—a kid shore wastes energy when a bee gits in 'em."

Here is a little vignette of church in the Valley of the Three Forks o' the Wolf:

The minister conducted the services in his shirt-sleeves, without collar, and with the sleeves rolled up. There is no organ in the church and he played a guitar as he led the earnest singing.

As material of a nation, the best thing about Alvin York is that he is not the only one of his kind. One of York's neighbors, Alvin Terry, ran a bear into a cave. It was not a commodious cave, but about the worst place to stage a bear fight that could be imagined. Here is his diagnosis of his springs of action:

"Ef the dogs couldn't git out whatever wuz in there, and wuz only keepin' hit in, I sat down to think hit over. I 'lowed I would tell some one en folks would say, 'that's the man who had a bear in a cave, and did not git him.' Ef I went in en come out alive with scratches on me, folks would say 'a bear done that, but he got the bear.'"

These people shoot close. They shoot the hair-trigger rifles of their sires and grandsires, and their matches are usually off-hand at twenty-seven yards, or at forty yards from a rest. From his boyhood, Alvin York and his father were regular participants in these functions, where the prizes were turkeys, sheep, and beeves. The conditions of the contest are well described in the book. The bull's-eye was not an eight-inch disk, but the intersection of two knife-blade marks, a mere point, without length or breadth. And they measured the hits with compasses. Says our author:

So accurate were they, that when the bullet tore out the point where the two knife-blade marks crossed, it was simply considered a good shot. It was called "cutting centre." But to decide the winning shot from among those who cut centre it was necessary to ascertain how much of the ball lay across centre.

Each contestant who claimed a chance to win brought his board to the judges for award. For each one of them a bulb was cut in half, and the half, with the flat side up, was forced into the bullet hole in the target until level with the board's surface. With a compass the exact centre of the face of the half-bullet was marked—a dent, as if made by a pin-point. Then across the surface of the bright, newly-cut lead, the knife-blade marks of the original bull's-eye, partly torn away by the shot, were retraced. The distance between the pin-dent centre and the point where the knife-marks crossed could then be exactly measured.

York had so little schooling that it seems invidious to mention how little. He helped as striker in his father's blacksmith shop in the cave at Coonrod's spring; and he plowed and harvested as a hired hand to help bring up the rest of the children. Like a simple Cincinnatus he has said: "When they drafted me I was plowing"; and probably he never heard of Cincinnatus. After the armistice they did everything they could to ruin him. They took him all over France, for all the armies wanted to see him, and they decorated him and banqueted him, and had him on reviewing stands, and at horse shows and other great gatherings, and heaped more glory on him in Europe and in America than is good for any man. It was a violent transition, and one to turn the head of far more sophisticated persons than he, but it never shook him nor confused him, nor spoiled him. The quiet calm of the mountains and the deep woods were his possession and his self-possession:

He was keenly observant of all that went on around him in the training-camp. Few sounds or motions escaped him, though it was in a seemingly stoic mien that he contemplated the things that were new to him. In the presence of those whose knowledge or training he recognized as superior to his own he calmly waited for them to act, and so accurate were his observations that the officers of his regiment looked upon him as one by nature a soldier, and they said of him that he "always seemed instinctively to know the right thing to do."

Placed at his first banquet board—the guest of honor—with a row of silver by his plate so different from the table service in his humble home, he did not misuse a piece from among them or select one in error. But throughout the courses he was not the first to pick up a needed piece.

Military critics analyzing the tactics York used in this fight have been able to find no superior way for removing the menace of the German machine guns that were over the crest of the hill and between him and his regiment, than to form the prisoners he had captured in a column, put the officers in front and march directly to each machine-gun nest, compelling the German officers to order the gunners to surrender and to take their place in line.

Like many another soldier he kept a simple diary, and here is his own story of his great fight:

On the 7th day of October we lay in some little holes on the roadside all day. That night we went out and stayed a little while and came back to our holes, the shells bursting all around us. I saw men just blown up by the big German shells which were bursting all around us.

So the order came for us to take Hill 223 and 240 the 8th.

So the morning of the 8th, just before daylight, we started for the hill at Chatel Chevery. Before we got there it got light and the Germans sent over a heavy barrage and also gas and we put on our gas-masks and just pressed right on through those shells and got to the top of Hill 223 to where we were to start over at 6:10 a. m.

They were to give us a barrage. The time came and no barrage, and we had to go without one. So we started over the top at 6:10 a. m. and the Germans were putting their machine guns to working all over the hill in front of us and on our left and right. I was in support and I could see my pals getting picked off until it almost looked like there was none left.

So 17 of us boys went around on the left flank to see if we couldn't put those guns out of action.

So when we went around and fell in behind those guns we first saw two Germans with Red Cross band on their arms.

Some one of the boys shot at them and they ran back to our right.

So we all ran after them, and when we jumped across a little stream of water that was there, there was about 15 or 20 Germans jumped up and threw up their hands and said, "Comrade." The one in charge of us boys told us not to shoot, they were going to give up anyway.

By this time the Germans from on the hill was shooting at me. Well I was giving them the best I had.

The Germans had got their machine guns turned around. They killed 6 and wounded 3. That just left 8 and then we got into it right. So we had a hard battle for a little while.

I got hold of a German major and he told me if I wouldn't kill any more of them he would make them quit firing.

So I told him all right. If he would do it now.

So he blew a little whistle and they quit shooting and came down and gave up. I had about 80 or 90 Germans there.

They disarmed and we had another line of Germans to go through to get out. So I called for my men and one answered me from behind a big oak tree and the other men were on my right in the brush.

So I said, "Let's get these Germans out of here." One of my men said, "It's impossible." So I said, "No, let's get them out of here."

When my men said that this German major said, "How many have you got?"

And I said, "I got a plenty," and pointed my pistol at him all the time.

In this battle I was using a rifle or a 45 Colt automatic pistol.

So I lined the Germans up in a line of twos and I got between the ones in front and I had the German major before me. So I marched them right straight into those other machine guns, and I got them. When I got back to my Major's P. C. I had 132 prisoners.

So you can see here in this case of mine where God helped me out. I had been living for God and working in church work some time before I came to the army. I am a witness to the fact that God did help me out of that hard battle for the bushes were shot off all around me and I never got a scratch.

So you can see that God will be with you if you will only trust Him, and I say He did save me.

Here is cause for national pride as long as the nation shall endure. It is well that a serious effort has been made to learn and understand the man, with his heredity and environment, while there is still time. Under York's efforts to enlist help for the education of his people, the mountain folk will change in speech and outlook. But it is to be hoped they will keep to their long rifles, their conscience, and their loyalty. They are real Americans.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ended May 13, 1922, were $134,900,000; for the week ending May 14, 1921, $121,000,000; an increase of $13,900,000.

The bond market has given a good account of itself during the past fortnight. Advances were general, the upward movement being of a widespread character and embracing virtually every group. Second-grade railroad issues, however, stood out conspicuously as favorites and the gains made in many instances were spectacular, says Forbes Magazine. Liberty Bonds also were well bought and new highs for the year were recorded for several issues. Decided strength was found among the public utilities, especially for the low-coupon bonds.

Speculative railroad bonds are now subject to a combination of favorable developments. Railroad earnings for February show a decided turn for the better, and roads which have been hard put to meet interest payments on their funded debt for a long time past are rate is being maintained at 4½ per cent., despite expectations to the contrary by Wall Street for several months past; but the decline in bankers' acceptances to 3½ per cent. strengthens the belief that a further reduction in rediscount rates may now take place. The impending bonus legislation before Congress has perhaps been the deterrent influence in keeping up rediscount rates, but this is temporary. With a lower rediscount rate both time and call money rates can be expected to react.

The marked strength in Liberty Bond quotations lends weight to the conjecture that a long period of cheap money is at hand. Here the element of fluctuating safety of principal and interest plays no part and values are determined mainly by credit conditions. Thus, if it appears that capital is likely to be so plentiful in the future as to be worth only 3 per cent., Liberties are pretty certain to sell on a basis to yield 3 per cent. The tone of the Liberty Bond market can be accepted as a barometer for other bond markets, especially in the case of high-grade issues, such as municipals and underlying rails, where changing earning power does not add a speculative influence.

The higher returns on borrowed capital during the war have tended to establish the hope that such would be the case indefinitely, but the trend is perceptibly downward and the former yields of around 3 per cent. to 4 per cent. for gilt-edge bonds are not improbable over the longer future. The logical thing for the investor to do is to purchase as long a maturity as available and not be faced with the necessity of reinvesting before a great length of time at a lower return than now obtainable.

Foreign trade is essential to the United States if American people are to maintain their present high standard of living, James S. Alexander, president of the National Bank of Commerce in New York, told delegates to the Ninth National Foreign Trade Convention in Philadelphia last week.

"We have established upon this continent an economic society that has given to the average laboring man a higher standard of living than his fellow-laborer enjoys in almost any other part of the world," he said. "The existence of that standard constitutes one of the greatest achievements of American democracy."

"This standard, however, has been conditioned upon the maintenance of the productivity of the laborer, and this productivity in turn has been conditioned upon the continued enlargement of the supply of highly productive land as fast as population grew."

vated in some other parts of the world, yet we must recognize the fact that we have reached the point where upon the new land the operation of the law of diminishing returns in agriculture will cause a smaller and smaller yield of foodstuffs per unit of labor than has resulted in the immediate past. It is true that invention and improved methods of farming have tended to postpone to some extent the early working of the law of diminishing returns, but the evidence of the last few years points clearly to the fact that we are now utilizing less fertile land at a greater per unit cost of production than was the case in former years.

"If we are to maintain our standard of living under a condition of diminishing returns in raw production we must offset such increased cost by devoting a larger and larger proportion of effort to those lines of industry that yield increasing returns per unit, namely, to manufacturing. That we are doing this to some extent is evidenced by the census figures for manufacture. It should be borne in mind, however, that this process of offsetting diminishing returns in agriculture by increasing returns in manufacture involves an ever-expanding market for our manufactures and that such an expansion points unmistakably and inevitably to the extension of our foreign trade."

"From the most important point of view that a nation can take, therefore, namely, that of the standard of living of the masses of the people, we must have foreign trade to an ever-increasing extent."

Mr. Alexander argued against the belief that domestic trade alone can assure the prosperity of the United States. He declared that domestic trade is in fact dependent on progress in the international field, since this gives an outlet for surplus production and for industries overexpanded by the war, and thus prevents price demoralization. Although America's foreign trade is only 10 or 15 per cent. of its total commerce, he pointed out that its importance can not be measured by this ratio, saying that many of the most important things in financial and business life hang upon percentages of less than 10 or 15 per cent. and the average reduction from normal business during the entire period of a depression may be under 15 per cent. A change in foreign trade representing only 5 per cent. of total commerce may mean a 20 to 40 per cent. loss to some of our important industries. In conclusion he said:

"The welfare of other nations is so closely interwoven with that of the United States that if the question of our foreign trade is to be interpreted with any degree of breadth whatever, it should be considered in the light of the trade of these other nations. There can be no final recovery of the domestic trade in any nation until the normal international trade relations which alone support the great international division of labor can be re-established."

Money rates, of course, are prime factors. Time money is available in quantities at 4½ per cent. and even some difficulty is being found in disposing of as much as bankers would like at this rate. Thirty-day loans are not infrequently quoted at 4½ per cent. Indications are that credit will remain easy. The New York Federal Reserve rediscount those who would wish America to grab more than her proportionate share of the world trade.

"While the first fruits of such a policy pect and answer the question as to why we should have international trade by recognizing why the world must have international trade."

The announcement by the chairman of the Joint Congressional Commission of Agricultural Inquiry that "in the public interest the railroad industry must rest upon its own foundations and its revenues must be so constructively regulated that the operations of the carriers will produce enough to pay fair wages, cost of materials, taxes, meet the fixed charges, pay a fair dividend and leave a margin to attract investors of new capital," is very significant of the changed attitude of the government toward the railroads, and it now seems unlikely that any drastic rate reductions will be ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission, at least until wages are reduced sharply.

The March net earnings of the 123 railroads so far at hand make a very impressive showing. Doubtless the then impending coal strike stimulated traffic during the month, still the important fact to be noted is that with operating expenses cut only 8.9 per cent, compared with March, 1921, and with gross earnings only 5.8 per cent. larger, net earnings were increased 232.4 per cent. This reduction of the operating ratio is a most encouraging feature of the whole railroad situation and suggests that net earnings will generally show steady and continued improvement.

There is unmistakable evidence that general business is on the up-grade. Judge Gary reports that the Steel Corporation is now operating at 75 per cent. capacity and President Grace of Bethlehem Steel announces that his company announces that his company is operating for the most part at 80 per cent. of capacity. The motor industry is enjoying its spring boom and other lines of business are picking up. It is now generally admitted that any broad revival in industry must be reflected in prosperity for the carriers. The stocks of many of the railroads are still selling at what will later be regarded as bargain prices. As speculations some of the low-priced non-dividend-paying issues look good, such as the St. Pauls, Rock Island, St. Louis & San Francisco, Wheeling & Lake Eries, Toledo, St. Louis & Westerns, Pittsburgh & West Virginia and St. Louis Southwesterns, among others.

Much better prices should be seen later for some of the old-time standard rails that in late years have lost their investment rating; stocks like Great Northern, Northern Pacific, "Soo," Chicago & Northwestern, Baltimore & Ohio and "Omaha" may be mentioned in this connection.

Public utilities, as their earning reports distinctly show, are headed for better times and the securities of many of these companies still offer wonderful investment and speculative opportunities.

Very high-grade bonds have advanced about as far as present conditions or those of the immediate future would seem to warrant, and investors have begun to turn their attention to lower-grade issues and preferred stocks. However, this class of investments requires very careful selection.

Encouraged by easy money, increasing trade, and enlarged public interest, bull pools have little difficulty in advancing prices of stocks in which they are interested. The public, however, has lost such great sums through failing bucket-shops and in indiscriminate plunging in outside ventures, that it would be a pity to be hung up with stocks after this bull period reaches its climax. Consequently the higher stocks go, the smaller will be the holdings of the careful speculator.

The American Bank of Oakland has taken over the Stanislaus Bank of Modesto, according to announcement of its officers. It will be known as the Modesto Branch of the American Bank, with F. W. Hosmer as vice-president and general manager. Through its affiliation with the First National Bank of Oakland, the branch will have resources of $22,000,000, according to the officers of the Oakland institution. The directorate of the Modesto Branch follows: W. R. Alberger, Harmon Bell, P. E. Bowles, E. O. Edgerton, P. A. Dinsmore, Joseph R. Knowland, F. A. Leach, Jr., Russell Lowry, H. C. Morris, W. H. Taylor, and Ben F. Woolner. The officers are: P. E. Bowles, president; O. D. Jacoby, vice-president; P. A. Dinsmore, vice-president; F. W. Hosmer, vice-president and general manager; F. D. Moyer, cashier.

There seems solid ground for believing that the upturn recently noticeable in business will be maintained, judging by the figures received from almost every department of industry, says Strassburger & Co. in the Review for May. Iron and steel conditions are better than they have been since January, 1921. Cotton exports and domestic consumption are larger than for many months. Imports of manufactured wool in March were the largest since April of last year. Copper, tin, petroleum are making new high records. Exports of foodstuffs leave little to be desired. Building contracts (business, public utility, and public works) awarded in the twenty-seven northeastern states during the last month show a larger volume of construction than has been the case for more than two years. Freight car constructions for the first three and a half months of this year are not far short of twice those of the whole of 1921. Public utility companies are placing enormous orders.

Wholesale prices are slightly higher, indications being for stabilization at an average of about 50 per cent. above pre-war. Retail prices, however, continue to decline, of food especially.

Stock market operations have evinced great

There are Bonds--and Bonds!

The fact that a security is called a bond does not make it a safe investment. There are bonds—and bonds!

To be safe, a bond must have back of it a permanent earning ability adequate to meet all the business requirements of the obligor corporation. To be safe, a bond must be further fortified by a preponderate property value to which the bondholder has recourse in case of necessity.

The investor can judge for himself whether a bond is properly safe-guarded, once the facts are established. It is the function of the "underwriting" bond house to establish these facts by thorough, first-hand investigation. In this respect, our high standards are a permanent assurance of safety for our clients.

Perhaps you will want to consider Blyth, Witter & Co. securities for your next investment. You will find a well-diversified list of safe bonds from which to make your selection—and an organization ready and able to render you a superior investment service.

will, however, have the last word there. Reactions, the wise trader's opportunity, may be expected, but the general tendency should be steadily upwards.

The advance in the prices of stocks and bonds from the low prices of 1921 has improved the position of the holders of securities throughout the country by more than three and a half billion dollars. This rise could not have come at a more opportune time, as investors a year and a half ago were in a somewhat panicky condition. Confidence is now restored and there will be more funds available for legitimate business enterprises than would have been the case had security prices remained at the low figures established during the latter part of 1920.

E. F. Hutton & Co. announce the removal of their offices from 490 California Street to the new Hutton Building, Montgomery and Bush Streets. The ground floor and basement will be occupied by E. F. Hutton & Co. The second and third floors will be rented as offices. One of the distinctive features of the interior is the stock board room for the Hutton Company, finished in walnut, as are the other rooms designed specially for brokers' offices.

E. H. Rollins & Sons are offering a new issue of $4,000,000 the Amalgamated Sugar first (closed) mortgage 7 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, due April 1, 1937. Coupon bonds in the denominations of $1000, $500, and $100 with privilege of registration as to principal. The company agrees to pay the 2 per cent. normal Federal income tax.

These bonds will be a direct obligation of the Amalgamated Sugar Company and will constitute, in the opinion of counsel, a first closed mortgage on all refining plants, sites, and other fixed assets, having a depreciated value of $9,225,257, against $3,500,000 of bonds of this issue. The certification of all bonds of this issue in excess of a par amount of $3,500,000 is contingent upon the deposit with the trustee for security of the bondholders of mortgages upon farm lands in Cache Valley, Franklin County, Idaho, and bonds of the water system serving these lands, in a face amount equal to at least 200 per cent. of all additional first mortgage 7 per cent. bonds issued.

The depreciated value of mortgaged security and the face value of additional collateral security, in the event of the issuance of the full $4,000,000 bonds, will therefore amount to $10,225,257. The total valuation of lands and water system, part or all of which will thus form additional direct security for the bonds, has been determined to be in excess of $3,000,000. Net quick assets of the company are in excess of $2,800,000.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

The method preached and practiced by M. Emile Coué, the great French psychiatrist, has been seeping into America through the foreign press for some months. We received these messages in all shapes, but chiefly through that esperanto of the press, the cartoon. French cartoons are as merry at M. Coué's expense as the British, but it was an English caricature in Punch that first brought M. Coué home to us—before then he had been merely a name. The Punch cartoon showed Lloyd George sitting tight in his premier seat and "auto-suggesting" that "every day in every way he should get stronger and stronger." That is the Coué system in a nutshell, though we did not appreciate its synthetic quality until the publication of "The Practice of Autosuggestion by the Method of Emile Coué" brought the whole system to America, thanks to Messrs. Dodd, Mead & Co. and to Mr. C. Harry Brooks, the author of this astonishing little volume. Adjectives are undoubtedly overworked in the science of book reviewing, but "astonishing" is not too strong to apply to Mr. Brooks' researches in the Coué system. Perhaps if one read Christian Science literature one would be astonished also, but since we haven't, our amazement is all the fresher and more spontaneous for M. Coué and his American interpreter. According to the latter, information of the Coué system has hitherto been available for English readers only in "the somewhat detailed and technical work of Professor Charles Baudouin, and in a small pamphlet, printed privately by M. Coué, which has not been publicly exposed for sale." Mr. Brooks' own contribution on the Coué method is purposed to fill the gap and also to bring the French scientist's work across the Atlantic. We prophesy that he will succeed in both aims, for, if his book does not rapidly become as popular as "Outwitting Our Nerves," we shall be very much surprised.

According to M. Coué, Mr. Brooks was the first Englishman to go to Nancy—where his famous clinic is held—to study his method of conscious autosuggestion. The visit, which lasted several weeks, was in the summer of 1921, when Coué's method was still adolescent. The Frenchman gives Mr. Brooks credit for having helped him thresh out the theory on which the system is based. Whether one's faith goes the extent of believing that the mind can cure the body or not, at least a study of the Coué system convinces one that the mind can protect the body, and after all an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Doubtless in a few weeks the American press will be as Coué-y as our foreign colleagues.

Notes of Books and Authors.

The Hungarian commissioner of education has suppressed the translated works of Walt Whitman.

According to Lord Bryce, Anthony Trollope, who was a clerk in the postoffice, claimed to have been the inventor of the pillar letter-box.

Lord Dunsany has written a new "Don Quixote," called "The Chronicles of Rodriguez." This picaresque narration is said to be written rather in wistful memory than in derision of the chivalry of Spain.

A German professor of science states that Einstein was "discovered" by Henri Poincaré, the scientific brother of the French statesman, who, in the course of a lecture which he gave in Berlin, October 13, 1910, mentioned Einstein's name for the first time in public.

Gustav Wied's comedy, "Two Plus Two Equals Five," is to be published in America and Great Britain by Nicholas L. Brown. Wied is a Dane and one of the most conspicuous figures in Scandinavian literature. The English version is by Holger A. Koppel and Ernest Boyd.

Little, Brown & Co. are publishing seventeen of the best-known Molière plays in honor of the tercentenary of his birth this year. The publication of the plays, which are translated by Katharine Prescott Wormeley, includes a preface by Honoré de Balzac and Sainte-Beuve's criticism on Molière.

The Paris Temps has begun the publication of Joseph Conrad's novel, "Victory." His first introduction to the French public was in 1909, when M. Robert D'Humières, the translator of Kipling, translated "The Nigger of the Narcissus" for the Nouvelle Revue Française. M. D'Humières was an artillery officer during the war.

A new nature writer has recently been discovered in the person of Svend Fleuron—a Danish cousin to Henri Fabre, Ernest Thompson Seton, Charles G. D. Roberts, and the other devoted lovers of nature who have created a literature of birds, beasts, and fish. He knows the haunts and habits and thoughts of animals as the practiced novelist knows those of his fellow-men. Fleuron was born in 1874 at Catmedal, near Stege, the son of a landed proprietor. He entered military life, became a second lieutenant in the Danish army in 1896, a captain in 1911, and remained in service until 1920. He is considered probably the greatest living writer on nature and animal life in the Scandinavian countries. Svend Fleuron is the author of "Kittens: A Family Chronicle" (Knopf), to which Carl Van Vechten, the great lover of cats among American writers, has contributed a foreword.

Selma Lagerlöf, whose new book, "The Outcast," was recently published in this country by Doubleday, Page & Co., is a woman of great vitality. Although past sixty, Dr. Lagerlöf personally manages her country estate, Marbacka Manor, and finds time to continue her writing. Miss Lagerlöf is an ardent suffragist. Although she has never been in America, she is greatly interested in this country. Her dining-room is paneled in landscapes of the State of Washington, painted by an uncle who lived some years in Seattle.

William Rose Benét, whose first novel, "The First Person Singular" (Doran), has just been published, comes of an army family, his grandfather having been Brigadier-General Stephen Vincent Benét. He was born at Fort Hamilton, New York. He took his degree from Yale University and lived for three years in San Francisco before he took up the literary trade in New York. Mr. Benét was for seven years on the Century Magazine and is now associate editor of the literary review of the New York Evening Post. Among Mr. Benét's books of poetry are "Moons of Grandeur," "Merchants from Cathay," "The Great White Wall," etc.

"Cellars of an earlier century were in vogue as guest rooms among 'our best families,'" says Jessie Martin Breese in the "Country Life Book of Building and Decorating," which Doubleday, Page & Co. have just published. For a long time they have fallen into disuse as a place to put the furnace and do the laundry, but now they are coming into their own again. As a place for an ideal smoking-room or a day nursery where clattering toys and romping feet can not annoy the rest of the household and the children be free from the danger of windows and stairways, it offers attractive possibilities. Then, too, the small windows set high in the walls of a cellar offer the decorator a fine starting point in appointing an attractive billiard room. With a few alterations one can also contrive a conservatory which will serve as an indoor garden all winter long, or a guest room that has a mediæval charm.

The first microscope is said to have been invented by a Dutchman in 1590, but its invention has been attributed to Galileo in 1610. The microscope has been perfected until a millionth part of a grain of blood may be detected by means of the spectrum lens.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Guinea Girl.

There is growing up quite a school of fiction in English whose genre seems to be borrowed from the traditional French romance of familiar yellow cover. These yarns, for they partake of the nature of a conte, have also borrowed the happy immorality of Boccaccio and his ilk. A few years ago they would have not been published in English. As it is, they still have to dodge the English publication laws by frequent recourse to French—a fact that loudly wishes it to be known that this particular form of post-war, manifestation is for the benefit of cultured and polyglot people only. For the French is not translated.

"Guinea Girl," from which we are generalizing on the strength of its having a predecessor in "Peter Whiffle," is a novel with at least one claim to originality, perhaps two. It may even be unique in that it boasts a dramatis personæ, not one single character of which is idealized, either for better or for worse. For unforced character delineation, Mr. Norman Davey merits the palm. We can not say as much about the other phases of his book. The form of presentation is very artificial, and the story drags terribly throughout the L'Isle d'Escope episode. Its other possible claim to unusualness is that it is the story of a decline. Of course, there are other stories of declines—"The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," for example. But it is unusual and will probably continue to be unusual despite the fact that most people do decline from the high aspirations that were theirs in youth. But readers prefer less pessimistic themes.

"Guinea Girl" is a man's book, and rather a young man's book. The average youth will feel very smart reading it—if he knows French. And in proper consideration for his audience's tender years, Mr. Davey duly points the moral and describes the downfall of his hero. We assume that Mr. Davey himself is very young. He has power, but he needs to train it. On the other hand his work has the exuberance that only youth can give.

Houdini's Paper Magic.

For the person adept at parlor tricks and avid to learn more, "Houdini's Paper Magic" will be a veritable conjuror's bag. The great magician has not stinted his information. His "Paper Magic" lives amply up to its claim of being the "whole art of performing with paper." But though Mr. Houdini's instructions are explicit, he can not, alas, supply the manual dexterity necessary for their execution. A magician is after all safe in revealing the secrets of his trade. Fully equipped with the theoretic knowledge of how it is done, one only marvels the more at his adroitness. But the amateur wizard will find many tricks here to at least stimulate his ambition, and the book is fascinating reading for any one.

HOUDINI'S PAPER MAGIC. By Houdini. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.50.

The Cowboy.

Readers of Wild West stories and those who revel in cowboy lore will find a veritable mine of early Western associations in "The Cowboy," by Philip Ashton Rollins. Mr. Rollins' object has been to correct the popular fallacies of the Western film and novel which picture the race of cowboys as categorically divided into two or three rigid types. According to Mr. Rollins, the cowboy of artistic presentation does not exist outside book covers or off the screen. He has his characteristics, as every exponent of a special mode of living must have, but he is evidently more various than the popular figment of our imagination. Nor is his equipment so deadly as movie directors would have us think. In fact it is a liberal education to read "The Cowboy," and one which we heartily recommend to the makers and directors of Wild West pictures. True, the great charm of the Western movie is that its like does not exist anywhere, but a perusal of "The Cowboy" suggests a new departure in a realistic representation of the vanishing West. Quite aside from its supposedly revolutionary effect on fiction and film, "The Cowboy" makes excellent informative reading. Mr. Rollins has done his work well. He is systematic and inclusive and "The Cowboy" has the sound of authority.

THE COWBOY. By Philip Ashton Rollins. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

I Walked In Arden.

Jack Crawford's first novel, "I Walked in Arden," is of a lyric sadness very different from the current type of fiction—very different from anything we remember, in fact. It is far from the so-called realism of the day and yet one has a suspicion that it is founded on fact, if not actual history. The modern jaded appetite is apt to find it rather lacking in seasoning, for it is that rare phenomenon, a novel fit for the traditional Anglo-Saxon "young person"; but it is nevertheless permeated with a delicate spirit of comedy and its poignant end is one not easily forgotten. In short, the reader who is not too far debased by the Middle Western school of squalor or the Bohemian and cosmopolitan school of decadence will find a refreshing interlude in Mr. Crawford's Arden.

New Viewpoints in American History.

The average American citizen considers that he knows his country's history if he has the salient dates at his command and knows the cause and outcome of our several wars. If in addition he is conversant with American political history he is very well informed indeed. It is with the object of introducing to the older American citizen of some such sketchy historical education the philosophy of our history and its significance that Professor Schlesinger has written his "New Viewpoints in American History." It is true that the science of American history is a comparatively new one. Older generations were content with veneration and would have thought a critical and scientific attitude towards our past as sacrilegious. The result has been to retard the constructive study of American history. The renaissance of American historical writing began in the 'eighties and the new interest was manifested in the founding, for instance, of the American Historical Association, the American Economic Association and Statistical Association, and the American Academy of Political and Social Science. The study of our national history began to be enriched by sociology and economics. But as Professor Schlesinger remarks, the change did not take place over night and it was not till the early years of this century that the transformation occurred. Even today textbooks are written in the old objective style and one must practically specialize in history at a university to have an adequate idea of our national past. It is for the person of general information and for the specialist in other fields that Professor Schlesinger has written this very interesting essay in United States history. The author is professor of history in the University of Iowa.

Water Benefits and Obligations

The new Water Aqueduct Contract authorized by the Supervisors, and approved by the Railroad Commission, benefits you and obligates Spring Valley.

San Francisco will have 24 million gallons added to its daily supply, making the total yield 66 million gallons daily. This additional water will be brought into service by the joint efforts of the City and the Company.

Spring Valley will raise Calaveras Dam in Alameda County, thereby impounding more water, and will enlarge and extend its conduit facilities to Irvington. The City will build that part of the Hetch Hetchy conduit extending from Irvington to Crystal Springs storage reservoir in San Mateo County. Spring Valley will pay for the use of this conduit to bring in the additional water.

Thus the problem of supplying more water to meet your ever-increasing needs will be solved for years to come. This solution was made possible by a decision of the Railroad Commission, August 12, 1921. The Commission weighted its decision with strict conditions, and the Supervisors added others.

Spring Valley must create a sinking fund to retire the cost of raising Calaveras Dam and increasing its conduit facilities. If the City buys Spring Valley within twelve years it will acquire this fund. Spring Valley must pay to the City interest during construction on the cost of the Hetch Hetchy conduit from Irvington, and approximately $250,000 yearly for its use. Spring Valley must give the City a twelve-year option to buy at a price most advantageous to the City.

All these obligations the Company has accepted, and the City will benefit accordingly.

"THE AWFUL TRUTH."

The title that Arthur Richman has given his play places it in advance. The uneasy hater of stage tears is reassured, for "The Awful Truth" can only be the title of a comedy. There are a few tears, it is true, shed daintily on a lace handkerchief, but always with a mischievous, provocative smile back of them; the smile of a pretty woman playing with the defiant susceptibilities of her victim as a cat plays with a mouse.

"The Awful Truth" is an American comedy of manners; or a comedy of American manners; as you please. It shows a money-lubricated Western oil magnate—an honest, bumptious, artless, and rather caddish egoist—placed in contrast to the quick-witted, discerning, extremely satiric and fastidious elegants—presumably of New York society—who accept him, or try to, as society must do, willy nilly, because of his money, since its pleasures and luxuries are inevitably founded on wealth.

Mr. Richman has made his group of metropolitan worldlings very witty, very attractive, very nice. If you don't like the word, take it in its finer sense. For they are all too nice to take kindly to the nature's nobleman, who is made by his creator to be a most awful chump.

In fact, the designing author hit on the idea of avoiding stereotype by making his nature's nobleman so very objectionable, and the usually heartless worldlings so extremely pleasing to our friendly susceptibilities that he quite reversed the usual order of things; which was clever of him, and very cleverly done.

The story has rather a well-used theme; the coming together again of a divorced couple who have never ceased to love each other. And there is quite a delightful flavor of romance about it, without a degeneration into mere sentimentality; partly because Mr. Richman has a keen sense of humor, and an ability to express it in dialogue and situations with a ready wit and a disarming geniality that keeps the audience in a state of delighted amusement at all times, even when the bemused victim of woman's wiles is really suffering. For the woman is such an accomplished, beguiling coquette, and her coquetry plays so bewitchingly over her steady, undiminished love for the ex-husband whose recapture she feels a rising and unconquerable determination to bring about, and she is such a gallant and invincible smiler in the face of possible defeat, and her swift woman's wit contrives so many apt and gleefully pointed retorts, that the audience is giving out perpetually its tribute of laughter.

I have an idea that Arthur Richman, in spite of the smart, worldly mold in which he has cast his play, is really a romanticist, and has no taste for the cynicism of the day. For the wit in "The Awful Truth" is generally aimed at such things as a lack of delicacy of feeling, or masculine insensibility, or innate, rooted, self-satisfied caddishness. And besides, the author is all on the woman's side; which shows man's chivalry.

The play is full of glamour; the glamour created by well-dressed, well-mannered, agreeable people who show fastidious good taste in everything they say or do. And it is not until it is ended, and the pleasant glamour is removed, that it dawns upon us that Lucy is just a pretty, witty, extravagant woman, rather overwhelmingly expensive to possess, since she is hard-up even on a handsome allowance; and, furthermore, is going to marry for money the Western magnate who so objectionably glistens with Texan or Oklahoma oil.

But the gallant author cleverly creates in the audience an infatuation for the bewitching coquette similar to that felt by the resistantly succumbing ex-husband.

Ruth Chatterton backs Arthur Richman with all of her comedy reserves. She has her girlish charm radiantly enhanced by ravishing Parisian costumes, and looks her prettiest. And, as usual, she shades her utterances delicately, with fine touches of wit and teasing mockery; with an occasional breath of wistfulness or a flash of indignant fire. It is on account of these delicate shadings that she is apt to relapse into soft-voiced murmurs that sometimes fail to carry the length of the auditorium, for when she raises her voice I always realize that she regretfully renounces some of her most delicate effects. But that, of course, is one of the difficulties of stage-land, for people naturally feel injured if they do not hear.

Bruce McRae's part might have been written for him, so well does it suit his virile romanticism. And then he always, in rôles of the kind, is so reassuring in his conveyance of the idea of being a true gentleman, a standard, by the way, from which the author permitted Norman Satterly to depart when he became an eavesdropper.

But the author—who introducing this scene showed that he is influenced in some degree by old school romanticism—carried it off so neatly, by causing the jealous sufferer to be convinced that he is over-persuaded, that the audience greeted this breach of good breeding with a laugh of indulgence.

A really perfect characterization in the play, both on the part of the author and of the actor, Paul Harvey, was that of Dan Leeson, the Western millionaire. He was such an honest, well-meaning, humorless, densely impregnable rough diamond, so permeated with a simple faith in the importance bestowed by front-page articles upon his Western-oiled success, that when the countenance of this literal dullard was illuminated, during the numerous curtain-calls, by the intelligence of Paul Harvey, who played the part, it was really startling.

Mr. Miller is doing things so handsomely this season that he imported three additional players to round out the group needed for "The Awful Truth."

One of them is the Paul Harvey just referred to, another is Louise Mackintosh, who was excellent as Dan Leeson's didactic aunt, and the third is Cora Witherspoon, who was very satisfactory in a minor part.

Besides these new players we had the pleasure of seeing again how neatly the blond young Englishman, Geoffrey Kerr, can adapt himself to a totally different rôle. Annette Westbay was properly self-effacing, not even giving one side-roll of her remarkably lovely eyes, as a neat-handed dainty French maid. Bert Leigh was satisfactory in a one-scene part, and Elmer Brown gave an added touch to the general aroma of prosperity and good taste in the home of the Trents by the perfection of his deportment as a highly-trained servant.

Mr. Miller, as usual, provided handsome and tasteful settings, which made most appropriate and harmonious backgrounds to the exceedingly smart costumes of the women, on which feminine eyes gazed with rich relish.

Henry Miller was not in the cast, but being insistently called for he gave the audience the speech it wanted, and again it was demonstrated how solid he is with a San Francisco public.

As well he may be. Again he is giving us a real season, with a series of plays characterized by the flavor of elegant worldliness that we seem to enjoy so in the theatre out here, and, during these expensive times, he has brought out, in order fittingly to present them, the handsomest of settings and a large company of first-class ability.

DITRICHSTEIN IN "TOTO."

Two of the cloud of minor French playwrights who purvey to the seekers after light amusement, Hennequin and Dequesnal, collaborated to evolve "Toto." Collaboration is a habit with these gentry in Paris, probably because each new combination assists in evading ruts. "Toto"—adapted by Achmed Abdullah to English-speaking tastes—is a specimen of the lively Parisian vaudeville in which extremes blend to create plot entanglement. It is the sort of thing which the Parisians take as a matter of course, but for Anglo-Saxon tastes it is certainly going some. "Toto" the play and Toto the man are both gleefully untroubled by morals. Toto is what is, or was, formerly known as a sad dog; nowadays we might better call him in modern parlance a glad chaser.

No doubt Toto is the envy of the American t.b.m.'s who go religiously to the Bal Tabarin when they hit Paris. But Toto's crowd is the real thing, for this gayly degenerate descendant of the French nobility is the god, not only of the ballet girls' idolatry, but of such light ladies still clinging to outward respectability as long for secret sentimental adventures with fascinating boulevardiers.

It will thus be seen that those t.b.m.'s who cling fondly to the more highly spiced phases of translated musical comedy may joyfully wade, in "Toto," up to the neck, not only in allusive impropriety, but in that that comes down rather heavily on your corns—if they are sensitive to such things.

In fact, "Toto" is Gallic in the extreme, although lacking in that airy and elusive French wit which is of so palpable an essence that one's fastidious sensibilities are not offended.

The authors of "Toto" did not bother their heads about church members when they wrote the play. In fact they merrily deride the practice of anything so dull as pietism, showing up in gay colors the contrasting life of the Parisian votaries of pleasure. In the first act, therefore, we are shown the ephemera of Parisian night life engaged in the giddy whirl. Gayety in staged scenes of this kind is generally either muscular or hectic. In this case it is both, and is further enlivened by an unblinking series of bare-shouldered jests to which, by the way, the audience yielded a most joyous tribute.

In contrast to this extreme of suggestedly unbridled licentiousness we are shown, in the second act, the other extreme, at the chateau of Mme. la Comtesse de Tillois, wife of Toto. Here all is permeated with the essence of lip-religiousness and sanctimonious piety, for with holy pictures and songs, and unctuous allusions to a dismal form of holiness which takes all the joy out of living, the contrast is duly established.

The joke of the whole thing is to get Toto, an apparently chastened and reformed character, into this godly atmosphere, the sentimental motive being supplied by the presence of a daughter who divides her time between the separated pair.

In the final acts the lively complications that ensue end in a volte-face on the part of Toto, who, in order to please the average spectator, is made to add to his numerous other scalps by the re-conquest of the affections of his most godly wife.

As may be seen, the authors are cheerfully devoid of consistency, for we are perfectly aware that after a week or so of marital galantries the pious wife and the churchly atmosphere of the holy-watered chateau would infallibly drive Toto back to Paris.

Also, the idea of the daughter joining with equal zest in the revels in Paris, and the prayerfulness at Blois, is equally in line with farce, and quite openly and cheerfully incongruous. In fact, it is absurd to regard the play as anything else, whether in estimating its scenes of lively impropriety, the holier-than-thou attitude at Blois, or the sentimental wind-up.

It is manifest that Leo Ditrichstein took the play, in spite of its essential lightness, actual banality, if you treat it as a play instead of a farce, and lack of opportunity for any exercise of his more serious abilities, simply because of its superficial theatrical effectiveness, its ability to amuse, and the opportunities afforded his lighter qualifications in the character of Toto.

Mr. Dittrichstein's fine European manners, his fascinating accent, and a certain "way with him" that he has with women all fit into the character of Toto. He is one of the most expert and graceful of comedians. Everything he does is neat and telling, if it is only to flourish his cane, or remove his hat. He has a graceful presence, polished courtesy, mannered ease, fascinating urbanity, magnetism. So, with these manifold charms, he makes it quite simple and easy for us to account for Toto's vogue in the gayest circles of Bohemian Paris.

Mr. Dittrichstein is surrounded by a company of only mediocre ability, for the trained ear can recognize certain crudities in their speech, and their acting shows decided limitations. Nevertheless they have been carefully coached for rôles that are too superficial to be exacting, and furthermore the astute Lee Shubert has cannily seen to it that the women are highly ornate and shapely in the extreme.

Miss Mary Duncan, as yet but a tyro, has ease and confidence lent her by her youthful prettiness, which is very marked. The exquisitely symmetrical back and shoulders of Miss Clara Mackin provide an excellent reason for selecting the lady for the part. A certain air and tone of self-righteousness successfully assumed by Frances Underwood rendered her acceptable as the Baroness. A cloud of men and girls filled out the numerous rôles, handsome sets and radiant costumes gave the appropriate suggestion of moneyed ease, and the audience present testified, by its hilarious reception of "Toto," that it was getting what it wanted.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

"The Awful Truth" will be offered for a second and last week, beginning Monday night, May 22d.

For the fifth and final week of the Henry Miller season theatre-goers will have an opportunity to see the first presentation on any English-speaking stage of the play by Henry Bataille, "La Tendresse." It will have a strong cast, including Blanche Bates, Ruth Chatterton, Henry Miller, Bruce McRae, and others. In fact it promises to prove the outstanding event of the year on the American stage.

Grand Opera Season at Stanford Stadium

For the forthcoming performances of opera, which are to be given at Stanford Stadium in the early part of next month, Giovanni Martinelli, leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has delayed his annual trip to Italy for one month. This will be Mr. Martinelli's first appearance here.

Other artists who will participate in this season of opera are Vicente Ballester, baritone of the Chicago Opera Company; Léon Rother, leading bass of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Ina Bourskaja, the Russian Carmen, who has just been engaged by the Metropolitan Opera Company; Bianca Saroya, soprano, who has just returned to this country after successes throughout the European capitals; Doria Fernanda, contralto, who is a San Franciscan by birth; Georgianna Strauss, mezzo-soprano, and Mardens Argall, baritone. There will be a chorus of 150, a corps de ballet of fifty under the direction of Natale Carossio, and an orchestra of 100.

The operas are as follows: "I Pagliacci," Saturday evening, June 3d; "Carmen," Wednesday evening, June 7th, and Friday evening, June 16th, and "Faust," Saturday evening, June 10th.

La Gaite Francaise.

"Pour Avoir Adrienne," which had a run of 500 nights at Paris, will receive its final representation at the local French theatre on the evening of May 19th. This sprightly comedy-bouffe, which is the work of Louis Verneuil, son-in-law of Mme. Bernhardt—we supposed she had only one child, a son, but so it is stated—then gives gives way to the last play of the season. In presenting the famous Labiche classic, "Le Voyage de M. Perrichon," the rising generation will have an unusual opportunity to see actually played here by carefully trained French players a famous piece that only those traveling abroad could hope to see acted. The Théâtre Français did give it in San Francisco some ten years ago, and twice in a decade is a pretty good record even for the untiring and ever enterprising Ferriers. But we have to thank them also for putting on the local stage representations in French of a number of the renowned old classics—"Le Gendre de M. Poirier," "Mlle. de la Seiglière," a piece or so by De Banville, and recently several of Molière's comedies.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Trixie Friganza is to appear as the Orpheum's trump card throughout all next week. The agreeable Trixie comes with a brand new act entitled "My Little Bag o' Trix." Always a favorite here, she is said to be even more hilarious than on other visits. Californians remember her, not only for her Orpheum engagements, but for her work as star of "Canary Cottage" and "Poor Mamma," productions made on the Coast which had long Eastern runs.

Marga Waldron is essentially a première danseuse. A première danseuse is primarily a ballet dancer, and a ballet dancer must be at home on her toes; must have the power of dramatic expression, as well as versatility. These qualities Miss Waldron possesses in the fullest, and by a programme of wide range, in which she is assisted by George Halprin, demonstrates conclusively that the dance is a "thing of many parts."

Frank Wilcox has a bright comedy called "Hurry Up Jack." Mr. Wilcox is a versatile actor. In his time he has played every sort of part from Uncle Tom to Hamlet. Many of the portrayals have been with Broadway successes, but his experience is exceptionally wide, because Mr. Wilcox for seasons has been one of the best-known actor-managers.

Marie and Ann Clark need no introduction. Their artistry in the past is more than a guarantee for any future endeavors, not to mention the experience gained by their appearance in both London and Broadway productions.

To present something different in vaudeville has taxed the minds of some of the foremost writers of the world to the limit, yet the limit was not reached until "Like Father, Like Son," which is being presented by the Four Camerons, was conceived.

Julian Hall and Kathleen Dexter; the bracketing of these two names will please followers of vaudeville, for both are entertainers possessing ability, versatility, and a knowledge of what the theatre-going public desires. The vehicle with which they propose to tickle the risibilities of their followers is a diversified offering called "What's It All About?"

Sheila Terry is a graceful ingénue; she can sing, she can dance, and she can act. "May and December" combines an appealing love story with song and a plot. Harlan Thompson is the author.

Barclay and Chain are two loose pages from the book of fun, and they are a couple of these pages that are hilariously funny. Don Barclay has made quite a reputation for himself in musical comedy. Del Chain is well known in vaudeville.

The children are having a chance this week; Mrs. Colbert and Miss Haskins, encouraged, no doubt, by the success of the Tony Sarg marionettes, having staged a puppet show at the Savoy. They are giving performances daily at 3:30 p. m., but on Saturday and Sunday they will give extra performances. The programme includes two marionette plays, "The Tale of Peter Rabbit" and "A Puppet Circus."

DAYS OF '49.

The stage is set for the big "Days of '49" celebration in Sacramento, May 23d-28th.

The whole city is alive with action. Merchants are completing the work of putting false fronts on their stores, making them resemble the crude-appearing business places of more than seventy years ago.

The programme calls for six days of intensive action. On the morning of May 23d, opening the celebration, the founding of Sacramento will be enacted, with an Indian and guardsman sham battle on the main street. In the afternoon the Mining Camp will be thrown open. Scores of Northern California communities, clubs, and associations will have their headquarters in the camp, which includes a great casino, museum, whiskers palace where the two longest beards in the world will be displayed, a man-made mountain, Indian villages, mining exhibits, and countless other features.

The afternoon of the opening day, will be marked by the operation of the original Southern Pacific Locomotive No. 1—the first put into service on the Southern Pacific line and one of the first operated on the first transcontinental railroad. The old locomotive will be piloted by its first engineer—John E. Loneragan, millionaire manufacturer, who is coming from Philadelphia expressly for this feature. Its first fireman, Tom O'Connell, will toss the wood in the firebox.

The second day of the celebration will find the $20,000 Wild West contest under way at the State Fair Grounds, with Tom Mix, of movie fame, and his entire company included in the matchless aggregation of riders assembled for the event.

Thursday will be "California Day." Special trains will be run from scores of California communities. Two unusual events are programmed for Thursday evening—the "Governor's Ball" at the State Capitol and "Bret Harte Night" at the Days of '49 headquarters, with newspaper men as guests of the celebration committee and Sacramento Ad Club.

The outstanding event on Friday will be the "Gold Rush Parade," in which at least 30,000 persons will participate. Old-time vehicles and more than 200 floats typifying the spirit of '49 will make this procession one of the most interesting and original in history.

On Saturday the far-famed Whiskerinos of Sacramento will parade their record crop of beards, mustaches, and sideburns before the world. More than five thousand of them will mobilize at the State Capitol and swoop down on the Mining Town.

On Sunday morning an automobile pilgrimage will leave for Coloma, where gold was discovered, and services will be held in the historic church of that community.

Interspersed in the general programme as outlined will be old fiddlers' contests, exhibition shooting by Captain A. H. Hardy, world's champion, typical of '49, and other unusual features.

During the celebration the championship California-Nevada trapshoot will be held, and the Northern California tennis championship contest played off.

Book-Plate Exhibition at the Elder Gallery.

The seventh annual exhibition of contemporary book-plates by the American Book-Plate Society will be held in the Paul Elder Gallery from Saturday, May 27th, to Friday, June 2d, inclusive, under the auspices of the California Book-Plate Society. The exhibit is the largest of the kind ever shown, comprising designs by seventy-five American and foreign artists, representing practically every civilized country. The event will be opened with an illustrated lecture on "Book-Plates and Book-Plate Collecting," by Rev. William Augustus Brewer. Following the lecture there will be a reception by the California Book-Plate Society.

The piano or pianoforte is said to have been invented in Italy and to have appeared in 1714. Germany, however, claims the honor of its invention. It was introduced into England in 1766.

GATO GOSSIP

A Good Looking Cigar is not always a Good Smoking Cigar

You would think some men payout good money for a cigar just to look at. It is our opinion that cigars are made for smoking, not just to "wear," like gold headed canes and buttonhole bouquets.

Smoke a Gato if you haven't had one lately. Notice its fragrance; taste; mildness! Even the darkest wrapped Gato is mild. We never heard a cigar smoker complain about Gato quality—never in all the fifty years of Gato's existence.

There's a reason. The wrapper and every atom of every Gato cigar is nothing less than Pure Havana Tobacco. That's the story in a nutshell; only one quality and that the best that Mother Earth and Cuban hands can make.

VANITY FAIR.

The millennium has been delayed again. Satan is, beyond question, greatly relieved. Those chains of a thousand years are not to weigh upon his unholy limbs yet awhile—although, no doubt, it is but a breathing spell, and as soon as the organized women of the world can think up some new way to do it, the lion and the lamb will be forced to lie down together, no matter how little the lamb may like it, or how little confidence he may repose in that hitherto unexperienced arrangement. The present delay, postponement, retardation, or whatever you like to call it, has been brought about by a declaration of war by Congresswoman Alice Robertson of Oklahoma upon the League of Women Voters and other feminist millennial organizations. The casus belli has been declared by the Oklahoma Joan of Arc to be an effort on the part of the aforesaid millennial maids and matrons to "boss" her, to tell her where she gets off and where to head in, when all she desires is to represent the people of the Second Oklahoma District; also "knocking" her; also administering one "deliberate snub" in failing to invite her to the recent Pan-American Congress at Baltimore and to arrange a meeting between her and Lady Astor. And thrones have been junked for less. Congresswoman Robertson met Lady Astor. No mundane power could have prevented that. She had, so she says, a pleasant chat with her; and in the absence of contrary testimony from the visiting chatee we may assume that it was agreeable on both sides. But the agency that brought about this momentous juxtaposition of the Joan of Arc of England and the J. of A. of Oklahoma, so fraught with mighty consequences for humanity, was not the League of Women Voters, but a mere organization of men, known as the National Press Club. By it the day was saved and disaster was for the time shunted through an open switch. As for those other women of Congresswoman Robertson's country, the League of Women Voters, and "like organizations," with them it is a fight from now on to the finish.

That should be worth watching. We hope no marplot, such as former President Wilson says present Senator Reed is, will interfere. It ought to be better than the battle of Boyle's Thirty Acres, which was a foregone conclusion as to outcome, whereas the end of this no man can predict. Should the embattled hosts of feminism advance their banners toward the redoubts of office at Washington we should expect Congresswoman Robertson to repel the attack by a discharge of stenographers and woman clerks if she could accomplish it. That should make such a horrific report as to dismay the enemy far more than those firecrackers General Wu Pei Fu exploded in oil cans dismayed the forces of General Chang in the great movement of the Chinese reformers on the sinecures of Peking.

And it should settle the matter. We should expect the order of battle to be broken up like the ice in the spring, the Amazonian armies to dissolve like mist from a julep glass. Congresswoman Robertson has the upper hand, being entrenched, dug in. Though it is she who has declared war, the question remains as to who is going to attack. She can hardly advance any farther, unless she purposes to embarrass, humiliate, and totally discombobulate the enemy by breaking into the Senate. With senatorial patronage at her command she would be an invincible force and embattled womanhood would need shelter and refreshment. As to the poor old millennium, it seems that it must wait. With woman in such mood, the trouble has just begun.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, from whom the hereafter has tried in vain to conceal itself, has discovered the whyfore of the present popularity of baseball in America, or at least in that part of it occupied by these now thoroughly United States. In the first place, it is a development of the ancient game of rounders. Every Englishman that ever mentioned baseball has mentioned that; so we pretty well know it now. They certainly love to rake up the past, when it is some one else's past. In addition to that, there is the "spiritual presence of Babe Ruth." If this be true it is indeed a discovery. If the Bambino has a spiritual presence it escaped us. His material presence is well known to many thousand Americans to whom his spiritual one would probably be a bore. Imagine his swinging with a spiritual bat at a spiritual pitball that had a break inward at about fifteen feet from the plate. Even if he connected, there would be no heartening crack of ash on horsehide, and we doubt if he could drive the tenuous thing farther than the mound. Sir Arthur might have said that Babe Ruth was an attraction, and he would have been right; but not original. Huggins saw it first. So to make it a discovery he had to go into the rag bag of spiritualism and drag out a spirit for Babe. It is hard to fit it to that extremely material figure, which is about as sylph-like and ascetic as the form of Adam's celebrated off ox. There is nothing even gaseous, even fluid, about the Babe, to say nothing of spooky. But what industrious spook expert ever stopped for such a consideration as that? If you are looking for spooks you are bound to find spooks, and that is all there is about it. Meanwhile the crowds flock to the Polo grounds because they want to see, not a ghost, but a very physical young man knocking a hard, material sphere of hide, twine, rubber and cork over a material fence and into a bank of bleachers filled with Slavs, Roumanians, Poles, Irishmen, Jews, Germans, Italians, Frenchmen, Canadians, Canucks, Japanese, Russians, and a few scattering Americans. And all the ghosts in creation couldn't get their attention when the Bambino swings. Baseball is not the spiritual thing Sir Arthur thinks it. If it were it would not be much more popular than crokinole.

According to a statistician who has been doing research work for mutual savings banks, wives whose husbands earn less than $4000 a year make wiser and more economical use of money than do the husbands, says a writer in the New York Times, but when the family incomes rise above that point the feminine impulse toward economy weakens and the wives are apt to spend on dress more than they can afford. That the dividing line should be at just this point is curious, but, accepting it as correct, women in far greater numbers than men must be of thrifty habit, and the familiar charge against them as a sex that they do not know the value of money and how hard it is to get must be unjust. That no end of men who earn less than $4000 a year spend money extravagantly is a fact too familiar to be questioned. They submit to compulsions toward expenditures useless or worse far oftener than women do, and they are not as well able to distinguish between economy and meanness. This, however, is not always their own fault. Occasionally they are permitted, if not encouraged, to be lavish by the charming objects of their admiration and pursuit. But that, of course, applies only to young men—the unmarried ones. Husbands, at least in the United States, are safe from all such temptations toward a noble carelessness with their cash.

It is said that the Chinese made bread from wheat and rice as early as 1998 B. C. Probably the first bread made from yeast was baked in England about 1634. Aerated bread, which rises from carbonic acid gas injected into the dough, became somewhat common in 1857, but practically all bread, bakery-made or home-made, owes its leavening to yeast or baking powder.

Théâtre Français, the most famous theatre in Paris, and, perhaps, in the world, is situated in the Place du Palais Royal, and is the home of the Comédie Française. In 1900 it was destroyed by fire, but immediately rebuilt. The original building was erected in 1782, but was later much altered.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

According to a story told by Mr. Eugene Corri, an English pugilist had gone to America for a fight. Before leaving his father had instructed him to cable the result of the battle. The son duly sent off the following message, "Won easily.. Seventy-five rounds."

President Neilson of Smith College was in conversation with a drummer. The journey was dull and the traveling salesman was better than no company at all. Dr. Neilson soon discovered that his companion had mistaken him for a colleague and did nothing to correct the impression. Said the drummer, "What's your line. Mine's skirts." "So is mine," said the president of Smith.

Margaret, aged eight, who dislikes such household duties as are assigned to her, has seriously considered the problems of domesticity. A visitor asked her what she meant to do when she grew up. "Oh, get married," she answered nonchalantly. "And my mind is made up. I shall have six children; four white ones, and two black ones to do the work."

Four-year-old Bobby was stroking his cat before the fireplace in perfect content. The cat, also happy, began to purr loudly. Bobby gazed at her askance for awhile, then suddenly seized her by the tail and dragged her roughly away from the hearth. His mother interposed, "You must not hurt your Kitty, Bobby." "I'm not," said Bobby, protestingly, "but I've got to get her away from the fire. She's beginning to boil."

The superintendent of schools was visiting a class of very young pupils. He picked on a youngster to quiz and said, "Now, Johnny. I'm going to ask you to solve a very difficult sum. How much is three times eight?" "Twenty-four," the youngster replied promptly. "Well, now, that is excellent. That is very good indeed," said the superintendent. "Hell," said Johnny, "that's perfect!"

Orville Wright was being reproached for not taking up the challenge of the Smithsonian Institution that it was Langley, not the Wrights, who was the first to fly. A banker friend of Wright's said, "The trouble with you, Orville, is that you are too taciturn. You should go in for more publicity. Assert yourself more." "My dear friend," Orville Wright replied, "the best talker and the worst flier among the birds is the parrot."

The late Archbishop Ireland of St. Paul, Minnesota, was once riding with a country drayman during the course of a round of rural parishes. As they were passing through a certain village the archbishop said to his companion, "I was the pastor of that church thirty-nine years ago." The drayman turned to stare curiously at the bishop, who was well disguised in a top-coat buttoned high, before asking sympathetically, "And what caused your downfall, father? Was it drink?"

The retort courteous, as well as sarcastic, is instanced by a story of the Abbé de Voisenon, who had had the misfortune to offend the great Condé. When the abbé went to court to make his peace, the offended prince rudely turned his back on him. "Thank heavens, sir, I have been misinformed. Your highness does not treat me as if I were an enemy." The prince, taken by surprise, demanded why he thought so. "Because, sir," answered the abbé, "your highness never turns his back on an enemy."

W. S. Gilbert, of "Pinafore" fame, was a humorist from the cradle. Unfortunately, most of his early mots have been lost, but one, at least, perpetrated at the age of four, is still extant. His infantile impression of Joseph's many-hued coat was influenced by a parti-colored apron worn by an aunt. And that, in turn, went through a queer metamorphosis in the juvenile Gilbertian mind. The aunt in question wore the parti-colored garment upon some gala occasion, when the future author of classic comedies said to her, "I suppose you are wearing a party-colored apron because you have come to the party."

In taking testimony in the Colton will case some years ago in Washington a quick-witted old lady had been on the stand for some time on behalf of the proponents of the will. She had testified, among other things, that she was the editor of the "Book of Lineage of the Daughters of the Revolution," of which the late Mrs. Colton had been a member. Joe Redding took her under cross-examination and he commenced in a casual way, "I suppose, my dear madam, that you and Mrs. Colton may have compared your respective ages in some of your conversations?" "Never," replied the old lady; "I never asked her age. I would not dare take such a liberty even with myself." Mr. Redding made one more effort. "Ah!" said the attorney; "but I can find out both of your ages in the 'Book of Lineage of the Daughters of the Revolution!'" "No, you can not," replied the dame. "It is against the constitution to mention any member's age; it would break up the society." And Joe gave up in despair.

Dr. James Melvin Lee, head of the department of journalism in New York University, said during the course of an after-dinner speech: "The average person, as well as the average nation, is blind to his own faults. An American woman, a leader of the S. P. C. A., was soliciting subscriptions for the animals' cause in Madrid. 'Will you subscribe, sir?' she asked a Spanish grandee. 'I'll do better than that, madam,' said the grandee graciously, 'I'll get up a bull-fight for your society's benefit.'"

In a lecture on memories Dr. Clarence P. Ramsay of Chicago said, "There are many queer kinds of memory training systems. There is even a fantastic method of mnemonics based on the principle of opening and shutting the pores—however that is done. But just the other day I heard of a new method. A man went into a cheap restaurant and asked for a bill of fare. The waiter said, 'We aint got none, boss, but I can rattle off the grub for you.' Good as his word, the waiter 'rattled off' a list of dishes several yards long. The man was lost in astonishment. 'You must employ a memory system. How on earth do you remember all that?' 'That's easy,' said the waiter, 'no system at all, boss. I just looks at the tablecloth.'"

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Stronger Sex.

Dear Joan, there is a law they cite today,
Silly and viewed by me with much aversion,
Which says that, when a couple go astray,
The husband made her do it by "coercion";
That, if we fall into some pit of sin,
'Twas I that pulled you in.

The early ways by whom this law was booked
Forgot with antique precedent to grapple,
Ignored their Genesis and overlooked
The episode of Eden and the Apple;
How, when he ate of it, the guileless Adam
Was moved thereto by Madam.

You'll note that this coercive deed was done
Before the marriage rites were consummated;
And similarly, ere we twain were one,
My manhood by your arts had been abated;
'Twas you coerced me, hesitant and pale,
Up to the altar-rail.

Not that my own compelling powers were naught;
I had, no doubt, constrained you by my beauty,
My figure on Apollo's model wrought,
My features so refined, my voice so fluty;
I do not boast; these gifts the gods confer—
A kind of force majeure.

But, when my human will is matched with yours,
What is the issue of that class of genders?
Why, every time the eternal female scores,
And like a lamb your Algernon surrenders;
Bows to your judgment on the jazziest hat
And takes it lying flat.

Therefore I disapprove this ancient Act,
Though it may flatter my assumed virility;
Nay, if in any trespass we are tracked,
I'd throw on you the full responsibility;
I'd waive my manly pride, and you, my Joan,
Should go to jail alone.

—O. S. in Punch.

The will of Alexander Louis Teixeira de Mattos, the English translator of Fabre, Maeterlinck, Couperus, Zola, and many other Continental writers, contains one bequest that will interest a good many book-lovers who have loaned their favorite volumes not wisely but too well—at any rate, too generously (says the Living Age). The estate of Mr. de Mattos was not large, its gross value amounting to less than £3000, and many of his bequests take the form of books. He leaves books to many of his friends. One volume in particular is left to a certain friend and is described as one "which he borrowed many years ago and has not returned."

Produced Under the new HEXEON Process

ADDING A NEW CHAPTER TO THE BOOK OF ACHIEVEMENT

How We Overcame the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of CYCOL as shown on the CYCOL Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

An engagement recently announced in Washington, D. C., was that of Miss Alice Moore Harding to Mr. Robert Thompson Pell, son of Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Pell of New York. Mr. Pell is the grandson of Colonel and Mrs. Robert M. Thompson of Santa Barbara. Miss Harding's father is governor of the Federal Reserve Board. Mr. Pell is at Harvard, and the wedding will not take place until after his graduation next year.

Miss Esther Langley and Mr. Bradford Melvin, son of Mrs. Harry Melvin of San Francisco and the late Justice Melvin, were married at the Cliff Hotel last week. Miss Langley was attended by her sister, Miss Louise Langley, and Mr. Melvin had for his best man Captain Hugh Shippley, U. S. M. C.

The wedding plans of Miss Helen St. Goar and Lieutenant-Commander Ernest Gunther, U. S. N., have been changed, owing to the recent death of Mr. Henry St. Goar, father of the bride. The wedding was to have been solemnized at St. Luke's Church on May 24th, and Miss St. Goar had named as her attendants Miss Alice Hanchett, Miss Lucy Hanchett, Miss Helen Lynch, and Miss Mary Boardman. The wedding will now take place at home in the presence of a few relatives and friends.

At the First Presbyterian Church in San Rafael the marriage of Miss Gertrude Minton and Mr. Nicholas Kittle Boyd took place. The ceremony was performed on Saturday at 4 o'clock, the Rev. Herbert Thomson officiating. The bride was given in marriage by her brother-in-law, Mr. Harry C. Evans, and was attended by Miss Jean Boyd as maid of honor and by Miss Cynthia Boyd, Miss Ethel Lilley, Miss Isabella Sherman, and Miss Caroline Avery as bridesmaids. Mr. Benjamin Foster acted as best man for Mr. Boyd, and the ushers were Mr. Joseph A. Donohoe, Jr., Mr. John Kittle, Mr. Arthur Evans, Mr. Clinton Jones, Mr. Lucio Mintzer, and Mr. Edward Hills, Jr. Following the ceremony, a reception was held at the home of the bride's parents, Rev. and Mrs. Harry C. Minton. Mr. and Mrs. Boyd will make their home in San Rafael, in a house on the Boyd estate given them as a wedding gift.

Mrs. Willard O. Wayman, complimenting Mrs. Cecil Shallcross of New York, gave a luncheon at the Town and Country Club last Friday.

The Press and the Advertiser.

In practically all discussion of journalism, and particularly of daily journalism, says H. L. Mencken in the Baltimore Evening Sun, there are lugubrious tropes on the baleful tyranny of advertisers, and it is blamed for at least two-thirds of the dishonesty and imbecility that characterize the normal American newspaper. But I am convinced, after an experience but two years short of Dr. Villard's, that it is largely imaginary. The advertiser is a bugaboo behind whom incompetent and cowardly newspaper editors take refuge from their critics. I have never heard of him attempting to influence a journal of any visible integrity upon a matter of any genuine importance. If he comes in with a request, it is usually to the effect that nothing be printed about the fact that a fat woman has fallen down the main stairway of his store or that his brother is being blackmailed by one of his salesgirls. But for one such request that comes from an advertiser there are a thousand that come from persons who are not advertisers—persons who attempt to bring the most formidable pressure to bear upon editors—pressure that is financial, social, political, and ecclesiastical. That sort of bombardment, in truth, is part of every editor's ordinary day's work. He often finds it very hard to resist, and sometimes downright impossible. But I doubt that it is the advertisers who give him the most concern. On the contrary, I am convinced that he employs them very often as laboratory animals to demonstrate his courage and independence, and that much idle stuff thus gets into newspapers that might as well stay out.

The value of American property confiscated in Russia is estimated at $150,000,000.

PENNSYLVANIA'S BEARS.

In "Our Vanishing Wild Life" Dr. William T. Hornaday says: "The black bear is an interesting citizen. He harms nobody nor anything; he affords good sport; he objects to being exterminated, and wherever in North America he is threatened with extinction he should at once be given protection." There are bears and bears, says the New York Times. It is possible to become attached to the black bear in a wild state, hardly to the grizzly, certainly not to the burly brown bear of Alaska. But the grizzly is not so black as he has been painted. In the California Sierras John Muir hunted him with a notebook, and never felt the aching void of not having a rifle and cartridge belt. The Alaskan brown bear is not "a coward of heroic size." Miners fear him, settlers who have stock complain of his depredations. But much of the talk of the brown bear's homicidal mania can be traced to pelt hunters. Still, the brown bear is a tough customer, a dour fighter. Does not Dr. Hornaday say that "a bear hunt on the Alaska Peninsula, Admiralty or Montagu Islands is an event of a lifetime"? One has to look out for one's own skin. Yet the dean of wild animal guardians, who has hunted tigers in the jungles of India, thinks that both the grizzly and the brown bear of Alaska should be protected by a closed season. In the Pacific Slope states the grizzly is seldom encountered now.

Ten states hold that the black bear is "an interesting citizen": Alabama, Arkansas, California, Louisiana, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Washington, and Wisconsin, all of which treat him as a game animal to be protected by a closed season. The longest open season is in Washington, eight months; the shortest in Pennsylvania, six weeks. In Pennsylvania, where the black bear receives the greatest consideration, about 500 of his tribe were killed or trapped last year. John T. Faris, in "Seeing Pennsylvania," quotes an Elk County sportsman: "Pennsylvania is the greatest bear state in the Union—or the world, either, for that matter, possibly excepting Alaska, which is several times its size."

Local pride speaks there, but it is a fact that in the fastnesses of Cameron, Clinton, Elk, McKean, Pike, and Potter counties the bear colonies afford all the sport that any decent hunter could wish. Nor is the black bear confined to those counties. Arkansas poses as the Bear State, but Bruin is more common in the Alleghanies than in the Ozarks or in the Mississippi canebrakes. According to tradition, the last buffalo was killed in Pennsylvania in 1799, and the elk was not long in following him to the happy feeding grounds, but the black bear has always vindicated his right to citizenship in the Keystone State. In Pike, three hours' journey from this city by the iron horse, Bruin lumbers past remote polling places, if he does not vote. He shares blueberry patches with sun-bonneted women, native honey with the woodsman.

In the last bulletin of the American Game Protective Association, Seth E. Gordon, secretary of the Pennsylvania Board of Game Commissioners, writes about Ursus Americanus in a sympathetic spirit and with a humor that is almost tender. It pains him to know that in certain states there is a bounty upon the diffident black bear, as in Maine, where he is taken in mammoth rat-traps from which he sometimes wrenches himself to die Gordon with a proper pride says that Pennsylvania breeds big bears. The pelt of one recently killed in Potter county measured 8 feet 4 inches. Four men could not lift the carcass, and a mule was hitched up to drag it out of the woods. What a humiliation for a sober-minded mule! Four-hundred-pound bears are often killed in Pennsylvania. Vegetarians may well boast that there is not one of the bears annually killed in the state that does not thrive on berries, beechnuts, chestnuts, acorns, and honey, with such tidbits as ants and small rodents. Occasionally it is true that a bear feasts on a small pig, a lamb, or a spindly calf, but these are excesses. It is generally a shy and hermit beast. "We have yet to find," says Secretary Gordon stoutly, "a single authentic case in Pennsylvania where a black bear has actually made an unprovoked attack upon a human being." But it is well to avoid "an enraged female with young cubs." The story is told of a fifteen-year-old boy who, while hunting rabbits, fell off a ledge onto the back of a bear, but set the bear in a panic—the boy was not frightened, the bear lost its "nerve" entirely.

Polyandry in Tibet.

Colonel Howard Bury, chief of the expedition which is to survey the approaches of Mount Everest, the highest summit of the Himalayas, with a view of attempting to scale it this summer, has brought from his travels some very curious information about the conjugal customs of the inhabitants of those far-off countries.

They practice polyandry, i. e., that form of marriage in which a woman has more than one husband at a time. There are two marked types of polyandry, in one of which, called Nair polyandry, the husbands are usually not related to one another, and the Tibetan, or fraternal polyandry, in which the husbands are brothers. Suppose the eldest of twelve brothers marries, then his wife becomes also the wife of the other eleven. The second brother marries; he continues to share the wife of the first, but his own wife is at the same time also the wife of the ten younger brothers, and so on, until the last, who is evidently the happiest of all, since, while having at his disposal seven women not belonging to him, he has into the bargain a wife for himself alone. In such society it must require an elaborate system of double-entry book-keeping to keep track of conjugal duties.

A Matter of Numbers.

Times have changed since the days when San Francisco hoodlums used to lie in wait on the Harrison Street viaduct to stone wagon-loads of Chinese coming up from the Pacific Mail dock. The other day an old Chinaman left Pleasanton to return to his own land to die. He had lived in the little town forty years, and had witnessed the subsidence of animosity against his race in California—a change brought about by slow and imperceptible degrees. His neighbors and friends—and all his neighbors appear to have been his friends—went to the station to see him off, and presented him with a watch and chain. In China he will wait for death, and he will have with him until the end, let us hope, his token of American friendship from a state where his people once were hated as bitterly as an alien race was ever hated anywhere. It has been an amazing transition, a long, slow, but real conversion of public sentiment, something about which the old Chinaman in China may long sit and wonder by the yellow wall of his hut. He may never understand it, and it may not be important if he doesn't, but it is something for us to understand if we can. That change has come, not through any refinement in the nature of our local hoodlums, but through the operation of the Geary Exclusion Act. It is largely a matter of numbers, the lessening of competition or fear of submergence. In the South, where negroes are numerous, they have been repressed and kept under, by violence if necessary. In the North they were tolerated—until they became numerous, when they were hated as in certain parts of the South. If there were fewer Japanese here, or if we knew no more were coming, a great many virtues would appear in them to which people now shut their eyes.

Berkeley.

Upon the retirement of Dr. Wheeler, three years ago, wide search was made for a man to succeed him as the head of our State University. Experts in the national field of education were consulted, with the result that twenty or more tentative nominations were presented to the Regents. A committee of the board made a tour of the educational centres of the country, giving to presumptive candidates something more than a "once over." Several months were consumed in these investigations; and in the end the balance of judgment was favorable to Dr. David P. Barrows, who as Dean of the University was familiar with its needs and had demonstrated his working capabilities. Dr. Barrows was then—and is still—under fifty years of age. A son of California, he had supplemented studies here by periods of post-graduate work at the East and in Europe, by extensive travel and by experience of men and things. A vital, forthright, upstanding man is Dr. Barrows. If not a great academician, he is a man of highly respectable scholastic attainments. More than that, as head of our educational service in the Philippine Islands he had had administrative experience and had been notably successful in it. Further, he had had the broadening experience of military service in posts of independent command. As he had been the first man to be considered so he became the last. It was to Dr. Barrows' credit that he made no campaign for the post and that his invitation to it came unsought from the Board of Regents. Now for nearly three years Dr. Barrows has served as president of the university; and in this great place he has given confirmatory evidence of character and ability. The university has gained respect under his hand. He has represented it with dignity and power on notable occasions. Individually his repute, high as it was in the beginning, has grown. Today no man in the public service of California—or in private life—stands higher. His domestic environment happily meets the requirements of his position. Yet this highly qualified man, after a service of less than three years, finds the presidency of the university untenable. There is nothing the matter with Dr. Barrows; there must be something the matter with Berkeley.

No man working in any sphere under the authority of a corporate group may be successful without full and cordial support at the hands of his sponsors. It is of the essence of administrative efficiency that it shall be founded in definite authority. There is reason to suspect that at this point something has been lacking in Dr. Barrows' position. There is reason to suspect that individual desire for domination, that ulterior aims more or less secretly maintained, that unworthy jealousies have more or less had their part in influencing the course—both in acts and neglects—of the Regents and that the effect has been to bind the hands of Dr. Barrows. He has made no complaint. Even in retiring he betrays no grievance; yet to those who have observed the course of events with attention and solicitude the fact has become evident. Dr. Barrows has not had from the Regents the prompt and the positive support essential to his authority and to his dignity. Indifference and neglect on the part of some members of the board have left him subject to the machinations of others. Thus he has worked under onerous conditions, none the less so because he himself has not so much as hinted at their existence.

Among unseen forces in the organization and administration at Berkeley there has long been growing in the case of certain influential members of the academic senate a mischievous feeling that university administration ought largely to be subject to its suggestions or commands. In the academic senate there are those who resented the selection of Dr. Barrows for the presidency. They would have resented the selection of any man to that post, however qualified or distinguished. It appears to be in the nature of the teaching profession to object to supervisory authority, to claim for each professor a species of cantankerous independence, to protest against any and every act on the part of whoever may be charged with duties that may run counter to individual theories or vanities. Although forever quarreling among themselves, members of an academic senate are always united in criticism of a president, especially when that official lacks the support of a firm and united Board of Regents. To what extent the academic senate at Berkeley has annoyed or thwarted Dr. Barrows, precisely as it did his predecessor and precisely as it will array itself against his successor, may not definitely be known. But one thing is certain, namely, that in the immediate instance the spirit of the senate has worked out in a running fire of nagging and pin-pricking. It was the duty of the Regents to take stock of this situation and to nullify its effects by giving to the president authority to deal at will with those who have sought to embarrass his work. The Board of Regents has not done this, partly because there have been in the board those who have been willing that the president should be subjected to annoyance, partly because other members of the board have taken their duty indifferently or have neglected it altogether. So much for interior conditions in the organization of the university.

We come now to consider other matters mischievous in their effects in relation to the work of the university and of its service to the state. There has long been at Berkeley what we may style an obsession of numbers. Ambition to make the university the biggest of its kind—or of any kind—has inspired a policy fatal to the normal purposes of a school of the higher culture. It has confounded the unfit with the fit. It has promoted lower as distinct from higher standards of entrance and of examination. The tendency has been to make of Berkeley something between a Chautauqua circle and a country club. Student activities as distinct from academic thoroughness have, with the idea of making the university attractive to numbers, all but destroyed the atmosphere which makes for academic spirit. Student standing has related quite as much to things extraneous and futile as to things essential and important. In consequence there has been engrafted upon the system a multitude of things foolish and futile tending, not to thoroughness and dignity, but to their opposites. In connection with the university the public more frequently hears of matters frivolous than serious. It is a rare week when public attention is not invited more to sporting and social events than to things that should engross the major part of the time and attention of students. There has been created a campus atmosphere in which dirty corduroys and rough-neck sweaters are yielded a higher consideration than ambition or diligence in studies. The public is more frequently disgusted by pictured representations of bare-legged girls dancing under the college oaks than edified by student groups attending to their legitimate work. There are times when devotion to athletics and what is called æsthetic dancing, mostly in underclothes or no clothes at all, appears to have superseded the humanities, mathematics, or the classics.

The dignity and even the character of the university is degraded by efforts to extend its courses into the sphere of superfluities and superficialities. Advertisements on dead walls and in street-cars to effect that "If you can not come to the university, the university will come to you," are not edifying to thoughtful minds. It should not be a function of the university to contribute to cheap and superficial phases of education. Rather its policies should reflect the ancient wisdom embodied in the saying that a little learning is a dangerous thing. Still less edifying is the fact that a branch of the university is maintained among the convicts at San Quentin. Surely whatever of benefit the university in charity and wisdom might yield to the derelicts of society should be provided in ways not directly affiliating our great state school with those who for the good of society we place behind stone walls and in locked cells.

Many times when the Argonaut has asked why the university advertises itself in company with Mr. Heinz' invitation to the public to buy his pickles and baked beans, why it seeks to purvey half-knowledge or less through its extension courses, why it teaches the arts of hair-dressing and millinery, why it imposes upon its system anywhere from a score to two score trivial things unrelated to general culture, the answer has been that its policy is to "popularize" itself. And when inquiry has been pursued there has come frank confession that by these methods it is sought so to extend the functions of the school as to broaden its basis and so get from the taxpayer larger appropriations of money. In other words, the business management of the administration has been pursuing the arts of salesmanship by tricks of trade that bear no relation to the legitimate work of the university. The plain truth of the matter is that to a notable degree the normal and wholesome purposes of university administration have been subordinated to a policy out of harmony or propriety as related to the purposes for which the school was founded and for which it deserves to be maintained.

One day last week some two thousand young men and women were given diplomas of graduation. It is pertinent to speculate as to what proportion of this vast output of the university has in reality been benefited by four years' experience of student life under the conditions at Berkeley? How much of real scholarship does a graduate diploma imply? And by the same token, what degree of loss is reflected in waste of time, in lack of discipline, in discursive habits established in campus life? We do not question that some have gained that which may serve themselves and ultimately serve society, but of this we are sure that many—perhaps the greater number—have left college less fit to meet the requirements of practical life than when they entered it. There can, of course, be no immediate testimony to support this presumption, but every employer who has had to do with the product of the university has discovered that before the average "college man" can be turned to practical account he has a vast deal to unlearn, chief among them careless and dilatory habits. It would seem that a school designed and maintained at great cost to prepare young men and women for usefulness in society ought to develop in them propensities, ambitions, a discipline that are less frequently honored in the observance than in the breach.

Demands from the university multiply. There seems no limit to its capacity to consume money to the end of adding new courses, extending outside courses, of providing the machinery and other means of student entertainment. What the university really needs is, not extension of courses and facilities, but concentration of its work upon essentials with the cutting off of a thousand-and-one things that tend to disturb rather than promote academic efficiency. Above all, there needs to be such stiffening of standards as will promote an academic spirit, and at the same time eliminate the multitude of hangers-on who resort to the campus, not for the purposes to which it was dedicated and for which it is maintained, but as a place of entertainment and amusement. The university ought to be available to those who seriously pursue serious studies; its atmosphere should be favorable to these high purposes. Things which tend to attract the frivolous—the many whose wish is not for serious work, but to kill time pleasantly—should find no place in the curriculum and no license in the spirit of indulgence. The taxpayers of California will not grudge to the university all that may be required to promote its really useful activities, but they do grudge the enormous charges built up in support of the things which tend to make Berkeley a gigantic merry-go-round and at the same time a hindrance to serious seekers after knowledge.

The need of the university is, not for more money, but for less. A policy more considerate of proprieties and economies—that would promote every legitimate requirement and reject every legitimate appeal—could not fail to rid the school of hangers-on and at the same time strengthen it as an agency of substantial and wholesome culture. What is now wasted in frivolities would much more than supply liberal provision for all that is worth while in the life of the university. It is neither right nor fair that the taxpayers should be asked to sustain an institution that in many aspects wears the character of a country club. It is not fair to those who wish to pursue advanced studies that they should be crowded from the classrooms by multitudes who throng the campus because they may nowhere else find time-killing diversions free of cost.

The system under which students—for the most part little more than children—are permitted to select courses of study at their whim or convenience has been a source of much that is vicious in university life. Lines of study should be adapted to the capabilities and the purposes of those who attend upon the university. Prescription of study courses is the proper business of educational experts. Give to students leave to choose courses of study and four out of five will make choice with an eye mainly or solely to whatever may yield "credits" and convenient hours, with little regard or none at all to what may be essential to mental and moral development. If the system which plays into the hands of shirkers were abrogated, if college courses were defined and enforced to the end of developing intellect and character, if examinations were directed to elimination of the unfit, we should have a very different condition at Berkeley. The cost of the school would be less, its efficiency as an agency of public service would be vastly enhanced. The many attendant upon Berkeley for frivolous reasons not only harm themselves through waste of their own time, through acquiring habits of idleness or carelessness, and through stimulation of impractical ambitions, but they grievously affect the interest of those who are there legitimately. Their presence overcrowds the classrooms. It creates an atmosphere fatal to academic spirit and to academic thoroughness. All this is trite enough. It is known to every observer of conditions at Berkeley. Yet the mischief continues unchecked. Explanation is to be found in the obsession of numbers, in the fallacy that the school must be made "popular," in the notion that state support must be promoted by application of the practices of salesmanship. All which is a jumble of errors. There need be no fear that the university will lack support under a policy that would adjust its courses to those—to those only—who in good faith, in honest purpose, and in sober mind resort to it.

Fundamental in the organization at Berkeley there is a condition that has, we fear, become fixed beyond correction. But the fact that discussion of the co-educational system may be in a practical sense futile shall not deter the Argonaut from speaking a plain mind. Nobody these days wishes to deny to women opportunity for any form of education they may desire. The day is past when women were held to be mentally inferior or when it was deemed judicious to deny to them facilities of culture in any sphere. But the fact that women are entitled to equal privileges with men, to the aid of the state in the matter of education, does not imply that men and women must be instructed in precisely the same things, at the same times, and in the same classrooms. When young men and young women are brought together under conditions as they exist at Berkeley—and at a hundred other schools the country over—there enters into the situation an equation that is to the advantage of neither. Under the co-educational system there is inevitable loss of the concentration that makes for excellence in college work or in any other kind of work. Young persons brought into intimate association at a period of life when sex sensibility in its subtle forms and tendencies is at highest are exposed to distractions and not infrequently to temptations beyond the limits of moral control. There will be few to deny that best results are attained in schools where indiscriminate mixing of sexes is not practiced. Harvard and Yale continue to produce a better standardized type of man than the co-educational schools, just as Smith, Vassar, and Bryn Mawr yield a superior sort of woman.

We have at Mills a poorly endowed, still struggling, but promising women's college. In the judgment of the Argonaut it would be a policy of wisdom for the state to take over this school and affiliate it with Berkeley, precisely as Radcliffe is associated with Harvard and Barnard with Columbia. In making Mills a state college for women, Berkeley should be left exclusively a school for men. This suggestion, we repeat, is probably beyond the line of practicability, since sentimentalism long ago brought the state to adopt co-education as a fixed policy. None the less, it is a bad policy—bad for men students, bad for women students, over-costly, in many ways mischievous if not positively vicious. An interesting speculation rests upon the query as to how separation into different schools of men and women, those now attendant at Berkeley, would affect the class rolls. We suspect that it would automatically eliminate fully half of the young women, thus relieving the university of a considerable element attendant upon its courses neither for its own good nor that of the community.

There are times—nearly all times, in fact—when it appears to be forgotten that a vital necessity of the country is the higher education of a considerable element of its citizenship; and in the sphere of higher education we do not include half of the courses pursued at Berkeley. We do not believe the education of farmers, horse doctors, tradesmen of various crafts, milliners, æsthetic dancers and scenario writers is in any sense the duty of a school of higher culture. It should be left to trades schools, of which the University Farm at Davis is a notably fine example, to train students in the sphere of practical industry. The jumbling up of all these things with schools of academics is mischievous all round. It is fatal to the higher forms of intellectual culture. Not all will admit it, but every scholar, every serious social observer knows it for the truth.

Dr. Barrows having resigned the presidency of Berkeley, it now becomes necessary to find a man for that post. Two types are practicable—only two. A man of subservient character who will allow the Academic Senate to rule him, a man who will hold the place without dignifying it or making it effective, would perhaps be able to rub along for a few years. Such men may be found in numbers, but no school ever attained a high position or achieved notable public service under such administration. The alternative is a man of high character and of personal force who will demand as the first condition of acceptance positive support at the hands of the Regents. Upon the heels of Dr. Barrows' experience no man really fit for the place will take it unless his authority shall be definite. If such a man shall be desired—and it ought to be so—a man of demonstrated character—a man who will not hold the post under other than right conditions—should be sought. The Argonaut does not know a better man for the job than David P. Barrows.

The Primary Elections and the Bonus Issue.

The renomination of Congressman McArthur in the Oregon primary of last week is a significant fact as exhibiting the public mind of our neighboring state in the matter of the bonus. McArthur has from the beginning stood openly against the proposed raid and it was made a distinct issue in his campaign. As in his campaign of several years ago, when his vote against the Adamson Act was an issue, he has won by a handsome majority. All of which may be taken as proof that when an honest man follows his convictions without fear or evasion he unfailingly commands the respect of the community he serves. This has been notably demonstrated in our own state by the career of Julius Kahn; and a thousand illustrations are supplied in the political history of the country.

Even more significant as related to the bonus issue is the success of Senator Pepper in Pennsylvania. Pepper has been a logical and effective as well as an outspoken opponent of the bonus bill in the Senate. In the Pennsylvania primary campaign his position on this issue was made subject to an organized assault by the leaders of the Legion. Pennsylvania was flooded with speakers and with literature urging voters to cast their ballots against Pepper.

Here are samples of legends pasted against every dead wall in the state and advertised widely in the newspapers:

Pepper has insulted the veteran and his family and is strongly opposed to the bonus bill. The way to help ourselves is to put a man in the Senate who will look after our interests. Nominate Burke.

This, of course, was barefaced falsehood. Pepper did not insult the veteran or his family. What he did was to oppose the bonus raid as illegitimate in itself and as vicious in its effects. In the Pennsylvania primary 760,000 votes were cast, Pepper receiving 490,000 and Burke 270,000. Thus Pepper's majority over Burke is approximately 220,000. In the State of Pennsylvania there are approximately 385,000 ex-service men. Burke's total vote—he being avowedly for the bonus—of 270,000 was less than the total membership of the Legion by 115,000 votes.

Thus the claim that the membership of the Legion is practically a unit behind the bonus bill is emphatically exploded. It is not the rank-and-file of the Legion, but its official organization that is urging the bonus. Here is proof that the Legion officials have been misrepresenting the vast majority of the membership of that organization.

The nomination of Pinchot has been announced as a blow at President Harding. The facts do not justify this claim; on the other hand, they definitely refute it. During his campaign and since his nomination, Mr. Pinchot has again and again declared his friendship and support of President Harding and of the main lines of his policy. What the nomination of Pinchot does exhibit is the fact that the partisan organization which came into existence half a century ago under the Camerons, and which was perpetuated by Matthew Quay and Boies Penrose, has collapsed. The result supplies its own explanation. Pennsylvania has repudiated the system as now led which for many years has ruled her politics—a system which, however it may be criticized, has given to Pennsylvania a large measure of power in shaping the national policies.

Child-Labor and States Rights.

We may expect some dissatisfaction with the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the child-labor law of 1919, which sought to impose an excise tax of 10 per cent. upon the net annual profits of those employing children under fourteen years of age in any mill, cannery, workshop, factory or manufacturing establishment or under sixteen years of age in any mine or quarry. And, in fact, what looked like a good social gain appears to have been lost. The court says the law is unconstitutional, inasmuch as it invades the rights of the states, and it purposes to uphold the Tenth Amendment, which declares that powers not delegated to the Federal government by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people. Such regulation as this law proposed was not delegated to the Federal government as one of the matters entrusted to it. In other words, as the Constitution now stands, the states themselves must regulate the matter, if it is to be regulated at all—and there is ground for the fear that in some jurisdictions it will not be.

Nevertheless, disappointing as the decision may be to many, the grounds for it are such as no one regardful of the proper bounds of state and Federal jurisdiction could well disapprove. The police power of the states can not safely be invaded and nullified by Congress—for nullification, wholesale and complete, is what would soon result from the efforts of people who wish everything reformed by law to effect regulation over the whole country at once, regardless of constitutional restraint. We can not properly be controlled in personal affairs from Washington. The country is too big, its interests and industries and the habits of its people are too diverse. We have differences of climate and topography, of geography and geology and soil and products, that are extreme and vital, and they produce varying needs of control. They can not be appreciated from a distance of three thousand miles. A rule for one end of the country may be entirely inapplicable at the other end. In the early history of the states conditions were more nearly similar up and down the Atlantic seaboard than they were after the frontiersmen had crossed the Alleghenies, and swarmed over the prairies and up across the Rockies, and the nation had gone through the astounding evolution of a century and a quarter of expansion in a continental area. Yet the jealousy of the original thirteen serves the rest of us well today.

One of the curious things about the decision is that this undoubtedly correct states-rights opinion, which accords with fundamental Democratic doctrine, must in this instance be asserted by a former Republican President. It is Chief Justice Taft who delivers the decision—from which, by the way, there is no dissent. In it he declares that it is the duty of the court to decline to recognize or enforce laws of Congress dealing with subjects not entrusted to it but left by the Constitution to the control of the states. And this consideration, he says, must rule the court, "even though it require us to refuse to give effect to legislation designed to promote the highest good." After that, no one can call this a partisan verdict. Partisanship would have led to the other view of the law, and of the duty of the court. There could not be a clearer case of judgment independent of bias; for the best impulse seems to call for measures that will prevent the exploitation of child labor in factories and mines. But fundamental principles can not yield to impulse. And child labor is a difficult thing to regulate in an ideal way. Almost any device with that object will result in excluding from employment some children for whom employment is the only salvation.

However, the child-labor evil is not to be left without an effort to the control of the states, because some of them undoubtedly proved themselves unworthy of such control when they had it. Senator Johnson has introduced in the Senate a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Tenth Amendment, giving Congress the right to regulate or prohibit the employment of children under eighteen years of age. It is a pity we have to have so much Constitution tinkering. It is tending to make the fundamental law a fluid and changing thing instead of the declaration of fixed principles it ought to be and was supposed to be when it was drawn up. One beneficial effect of the proposal will probably be a nation-wide discussion of child labor; and another a reawakening of public thought about what ought to be proper subjects of state regulation and how much power it is safe to take away from the individual states and give to the United Congressmen.

Editorial Notes.

It has been discovered that California is supporting 974 automobiles for its office-holders, 688 of which are charged to the State Highway Commission. How many more would be required for the Water and Power Board and its attaches should the Water and Power Amendment pass? How many stenographers, door boys, clerks and inspectors and deputies and janitors and general hangers-on? How many soft office chairs for them?

The Soviet government collected as revenue in 1918 the sum of 529,000,000 rubles, gold. The revenue has declined to 58,000,000 for the first quarter of 1922, a prospect of 232,000,000 for the year if collections keep up. Still that is 232,000,000 rubles more than the Soviet government is worth.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Pertinent Question.

OAKLAND, May 21, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The experience of Mr. Henry B. Chase in respect to the impairment of the obligation of a ten-year contract for a water supply is by no means rare in this state.

When the railway commission was created by an amendment to that weird loblolly of statute and stump speech called our State Constitution that commission was protected against appeal from any finding of fact. Under this protection it has nullified many contracts between utility corporations and consumers. Now the commission is the state. It is part of the executive machinery of the state and its acts are the acts of the state.

The Fathers who formed our national government and framed its fundamental law knew that our civilization is founded on contract, therefore they provided in Section 10, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States prohibition of the impairment of the obligation of contracts by any state.

Mr. Chase and many others have been shorn of their constitutional rights by our railroad commission. Why have none the courage to make a judicial demand in defense of those rights?

JOHN P. IRISH.

Supporting Cowley.

BERKELEY, May 1, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Here is a literal translation of the Greek song, anonymous and ancient, which comes to mind when one reads Abraham Cowley's lines quoted in the issue of the Argonaut of April 22, 1922:

The black Earth, she drinks deep,
And Trees, they drink her down;
And Sea is what the Sun drinks,
And Sun is what the Moon drinks:
Why start a scrap with me, boys,
If I want a drink myself?

Very truly, KIMBALL G. EASTON.

LETTING THE GOVERNMENT DO IT.

Invasion of Technical Business by Politicians Can Not Be Trusted to Promote Economy and Efficiency.

Probably we are all Utopians at heart, and at some time in our lives have loved to dwell in imagination on an order of society in which three million, or thirty or three hundred million people would act like the Three Musketeers—one for all and all for one—doing their best, putting the product into a common pot, eliminating the selfishness of coal mine operators and steel magnates, and merchants, and capitalists who grind down the poor by making hydro-electric energy out of everybody's law of gravitation and charging consumers money for it. Probably all of us have felt at times that a system of industry under which some could make profits and other were unable to, and hence under which there existed cruel contrasts of rich and poor, was not ideal, and could and should give place to something that was. Some still feel that way, and the sentiment is encouraged by such industrial giants as Gilbert K. Chesterton, Sidney Webb, and Robert Hunter; or George Bernard Shaw, who thought the odds on Carpentier when he fought Dempsey ought to be fifty to one. Oh, yes—and we shouldn't forget dear old Karl Marx, who wrote great books to adjust the relations of capital and labor—a man who never did any labor and never had any capital. To hope for heaven on earth for everybody shows a beautiful disposition, such as we all have. Unfortunately it does not grow any potatoes, nor haul any wheat, nor work up any saw-logs into lumber. The Three Musketeers did not have to make a living. Their work was exciting, and their valor was supported by the taxpayers of France. In addition, they were quite expensive, and only worked when they felt like it.

The socialization of industry is a sort of creeping paralysis of the body politic. It has been much stimulated in this country during the past thirty years by German preachments, the examples of British cities, little understood, and the discontents provoked by the economic effects of an unlimited immigration. The wealthy succeeded in getting themselves well hated; and some of the haters seemed to adopt the principle that people must in some way be prevented from becoming wealthy. They thought they saw a chance in free silver in 1896, and in the municipalization of street railways, water works, and "utilities" in general. They are less numerous than they sound. In 1903 Mr. Bryan thought it would be a good thing politically to get their support by advocating the nationalization of the railways, after the example of some European countries where he had ridden on trains and observed that it was possible for governments to run them. It just about beat him for the presidency. In our brief government operation of the railways during the recent war the government went behind some $1,800,000,000; and it is interesting to reflect where we might be today had Mr. Bryan succeeded in nationalizing the railways when he said he wanted to.

The selfish motive of industry is apparent in all its management, and it is an ugly thing. But so is the engine's boiler, and its coal grate. Socialists, and many other people, suppose that if private industry could be eliminated, states and cities could supply the needs of men more abundantly and cheaply. But general experience shows, where just comparisons are possible, that almost everything done by a city, state, or nation costs more instead of less, and the taxpayers pay for it either in rates or directly. Nothing is free. And everybody pays taxes. The whole public is involved. If a man owns no property he pays taxes in the general cost of living.

Public water works are not unsuccessful, for water is one of the simplest of all utilities to develop and serve. In San Francisco perhaps the Municipal Railway, under the competition of the Market Street, has done fairly well, although some doubt it. But generally speaking socialized production is not abundant production, and if it seems to succeed in supplying goods or services cheaply it is because it is still limited to a few fields and can cover the deficits it produces by the taxation of properties not yet socialized.

The rule of politics is to make two jobs grow where but one grew before. The practice of socialized industry is to use governmental power to protect itself against the progress that might be made by private capital, as the postoffice protects itself against the carriage of letters by express companies. That sort of thing is a reduction of public service, not an increase of it. But it doesn't usually show, because comparison has been abolished by abolishing the only thing on which it could be based—the parallel private enterprise.

But not in all cases. The late Joseph Chamberlain municipalized the gas plants of Birmingham, just as some of our California socialists wish to socialize the hydro-electric plants of California. Gas would be cheaper. Private profit would be abolished and the people would get it in the form of lower rates. Why not? Wouldn't they own the plant? Wouldn't their own government control operations? All the waste, nepotism, stock-watering and general skulduggery of pitalism would be squeezed out of the gas business, and the people would have the benefit. The gas plants were bought, and in twenty years gas cost 2 shillings 6 pence in Birmingham, and in Sheffield, where a private company produced it, it cost 1 shilling 5 pence. When Mr. Chamberlain tried to teach the Britishers that what they needed was a protective tariff, some persons wondered why he met with so little success.

It has been estimated that the favors granted employees in the socialized industries of England represent an added burden to taxpayers of about 20 per cent. That isn't all. Manchester supplies gas. In 1905 the gas reserve fund was knicked $43,000 to entertain the king. That is government in business. Townley was the king of North Dakota, so the state-operated bank lent him money for his sisal plantation in Florida. It's gone.

Public ownership advocates love to point out the postoffice as an example of governmental efficiency in business. But they have no standard of comparison. One of the first acts of government when it gets into business is to eliminate the competition of private companies in order to enjoy a monopoly itself, just the monopoly which private companies have been damned for trying to create; and so the express companies are not permitted to carry mail, and we can not tell whether they would do it cheaper and better or not. But it is a fair guess that private business executives could do better with the business than the government does—that if Judge Gary of the United States Steel Corporation, or Samuel Vauclain of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, or William Sproule of the Southern Pacific, were conducting the postoffice for the profit of a corporation, mail carriers would receive more pay and letters would be carried and delivered for less money. It is at least as likely as that the board to be created by California Water and Power Amendment will supply electricity as cheaply as private companies do now.

Government does not have to do things in the best possible way, and it is not in human nature that political appointees, sure of their jobs and with nothing at stake, will ever work much more than half as well as they would have to work for a private corporation. Pork-barrel appropriations and log-rolling expenditures are not conducive to logical development nor the maximum of public service and production. Governments were never intended to produce, but to protect and preserve. They have to work through politicians, and can rarely get business men to help out. Sometimes when they do, the business men do great business for themselves. We believe there were some dollar-a-year scandals during the war. The government was so poor a business manager that it was extensively "profiteered." There is an effort on the part of socialists to foist on the railroad men retained in government service when the roads were taken over the blame for the government's failure to manage them better; but the government was in control, and if the wicked railroad men ran the roads for their own ends, that, too, was the government's fault, and a fault which it could be trusted to repeat every time it undertook a similar enterprise.

In supplying services such as gas, electricity, telephone, and urban railway transportation, municipalization as practiced in Great Britain has always been out-run by private development in the United States. We have built longer lines and more of them, our extensions have anticipated public needs, without having been built where there would never be a public need, merely to curry favor with voters; and the desired result, which is the service of the public, has been far ahead of such results where British cities have run the business.

The most superficial view of the field will show that government undertakings are marked by waste, incompetence, extravagance and clerical paralysis; and in any comparison they always have the advantage of tax exemption, as well as monopoly in their area. One of their worst effects is the discouragement of private initiative. Housing has been undertaken governmentally in Great Britain. Much appeared to have been done; much in the way of razing old dwellings was done. But it checked the formation of private building associations, and it has been said on good authority that every house built by government stopped the erection of four by private enterprise. That is a wonderful way to relieve the housing shortage.

In England the telephone is a government monopoly and the service a joke—an English joke. Discussing the situation after the postoffice took over the telephone system, a member of Parliament once said:

Telephones in this country were a private commercial venture. The government owned the telegraph, and tried to throttle the telephone. In 1892 the government forced the company to sell its trunk lines, and although it has made a parade of figures showing the large amount of mileage of trunk lines added, the service has never kept pace with public requirements, and there has been a constant stream of complaints from Chambers of Commerce and other public bodies, as well as from individual users. The truth is the government made a Cinderella of the trunk lines to the end that their favored telegraph should remain the belle of the wires.

The French government operates the telegraph, and it is somewhat better than the mail, but subject to the chance of delivering messages without signatures, or some other trifle like that. The government has a monopoly of the telephone, and if there is a worse telephone service than that of London, it is only to be found in France. The service in the Congo forests, where it consists of rapping out signals on hollow logs and relaying them across the country, is generally preferred. Business men frequently employ messengers instead of using the phone. That is good for the messengers, but hardly for business. One example of government management should be cited, it is so typical, and that is the case of the Gutenberg exchange in Paris. In the days when the "common battery" system was relatively new, it was installed in this exchange. The government was warned that it should provide adequate protective apparatus to avoid trouble from high voltage currents. But the continuity of policy that characterizes private enterprise was lacking, and the money that should have been devoted to this technical engineering requirement was switched to some more showy object which the public could see and understand. The result was that the exchange caught fire and left a large section of the city without telephone communication. That is political management. That is letting government do it.

We look to the government in this country to do our harbor dredging. A lot of money has to be spent dredging channels and sloughs that will never be used in order to placate contractors and voters in the neighborhood—so that the congressmen from those districts can "point with pride" to the amount of money they have secured for "public improvements." When a big transatlantic liner some years ago struck in New York harbor people called it an accident. The money that should have made the harbor safe had been spent deepening some congressman's channel back to Washington. One commentator remarked, "It was not an accident. It was a result."

The literature of this subject is extensive and growing. It is impossible to treat here all details of the matter or present an exhaustive analysis of the whole field of experience, but people are beginning to doubt the wisdom of trusting technical matters to politicians—and almost all business is technical. An encouraging sign is that the representations are no longer one-sided, the proponents of municipalization no longer have the debate all their own way. There is much to be cited now of an a posteriori nature. One case that is very illuminating occurs in Yves Guyot's discussion of the subject, as follows:

A high school professor of Elbeuf, M. Mouchel, afterward mayor of that city for seventeen years, and finally deputy, was attacked by the municipalization mania. He municipalized water, electricity, gas, the collection and disposal of garbage, and the burial of the dead. February 28, 1911, there appeared in the Dépêche de Rouen a highly eulogistic article extolling his work. On October 15th of the same year the mayor was obliged to confess that his attempts at municipalization were causing a deficit of 180,000 francs in a budget of 800,000. A sum of 250,000 francs would be necessary to cover the losses. After confessing his delusions and deceptions before a meeting of the municipal council M. Mouchel committed suicide in the cellar of the town hall.

That was too bad. The mayor of Elbeuf was probably conscientious and sensitive. We do not expect to see California politicians commit suicide if they are unsuccessful with the socialization of hydro-electric development under the Water and Power Act, should that measure be adopted by the public. The deficit is all provided for in the proposed amendment. It is to come out of the taxpayers. Why should the politicians worry?

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Señorita Felicidad Gonzales, head of the normal school in Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, is one of the interesting South Americans to attend the Pan-American conference of women. She is a leader in her community and a woman of great personal charm.

Master Alexander Ramsay, the two-and-a-half-year-old son of Princess Pat, is paying a visit at Windsor Castle to the King and Queen of England. Master Alexander occupies the nurseries at the top of the Victorian tower, where the royal children have always played.

Miss Pauline Floyd is said to be the youngest woman attorney to practice law before the Supreme Court of the United States. Miss Floyd, who is twenty-four, started her professional career with the intention of specializing in divorce. However, she has found the District of Columbia, her place of business, a poor location for a divorce lawyer, and her practice has accordingly become general.

Lady Cynthia Mosley, daughter of England's foreign secretary, Lord Curzon, has entered the movies. This information, however, is not Hollywood propaganda, Lady Cynthia having made her debut on the silver sheet, not for fame or money, but simply for the benefit of the Union of Societies for Equal Citizenship. Dabbling in the movies, however, is a great fad in England of late, and Lady Cynthia would not be the first English noblewoman to become a professional movie star. The titled actress' mother was Miss Mary Leiter of Washington.

Dr. Siburg Eskola, an eminent Finnish geologist, and his wife, Dr. Mauda Eskola, who is equally renowned as a botanist, are visiting in Washington as guests of the Carnegie Institution. The Eskolas, both of whom are from the ancient University of Finland at Helsingfors, are in this country for the purpose of establishing a research branch of their institution. The Finnish university, which was rigidly suppressed by the Czar, has been reestablished, and copies of many volumes to replace the library destroyed by the Russians have been sent from Stockholm and Copenhagen.

Mr. William Velpeau Rooker, Indianapolis lawyer, is recognized as the first authority in the United States on the law of the air. He was delegated by the conference of American Bar Associations to draft a report on the subject, which Elihu Root has pronounced a world charter for aerial jurisprudence. It is Mr. Rooker's contention that the air law is destined to be administered under the general rules of admiralty law. He claims that neither the air nor the sea can be geometrically "allocated." Mr. Rooker has been invited by the International Law Association, whose headquarters are in London, to address its annual meeting at Buenos Aires in August on "Jurisprudence in Aerial Communication."

Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman is said to be the strongest American Minister to China in many years. In Peking they say he is head and shoulders above his colleagues. The verdict of an important Chinese editor is, "Dr. Schurman must be a great man in America, since he is so honest and bold." He is liked by the Chinese, generally, because he does not tell them that America will save China—a frequent mistake of previous ministers. One of his strokes of diplomacy has been to visit all parts of China to study conditions. He goes about even the most dangerous territory accompanied only by a man-servant. One theory of Dr. Schurman's sympathy with the Chinese character is his long acquaintance with Chinese during his presidency of Cornell University.

The question that is agitating all the "salons" of Paris is whether or not Countess Mathieu de Noailles will run for a seat in the French Academy. As every one knows, no woman has ever broken the sacred masculine tradition of the French Academy since its foundation in 1636 by Cardinal Richelieu. Mme. de Noailles obtained the first prize for poetry from the French Academy last year, and so is logically eligible to a seat in that august assembly. Mme. de Noailles, who is the daughter of a Roumanian prince and the wife of a nobleman bearing one of the great names of France, is a poet whom Frederic Masson, life secretary of the Academy, and Stephane Lauzanne, the great French publicist, hail as a genius. She was recently elected a member of the Belgian Academy, and now that there is a vacant seat in the French equivalent the literary ladies of France say they will boycott the Academy if Mme. de Noailles is not elected. Incidentally, women form four-fifths of the audience of the Academy.

Ballade of Middle Age.

Our youth began with tears and sighs,
With seeking what we could not find;
Our verses were all threnodies,
In elegiacs still we whined;
Our ears were deaf, our eyes were blind,
We sought and knew not what we sought.
We marvel, now we look behind:
Life's more amusing than we thought!

Oh, foolish youth, untimely wise!
Oh, phantoms of the sickly mind!
What? not content with seas and skies,
With rainy clouds and southern wind,
With common cares and faces kind,
With pains and joys each morning brought?
Ah, old, and worn, and tired, we find
Life's more amusing than we thought!

Though youth "turns spectre-thin and dies,"
To mourn for youth we're not inclined;
We set our souls on salmon flies,
We whistle where we once repined.
Confound the woes of human-kind!
By Heaven we're "well deceived," I wot;
Who hum, contented or resigned,
"Life's more amusing than we thought!"

A REBUILDER OF EMPIRE.

The really vital history of a country is that of the men who have made it. Good national growth is not accidental. It must have back of it imagination, design, and will, as well as penetrating analysis and discernment of necessities. The men that can bring these qualities to bear on a country's development are its real creators.

Edward Henry Harriman was a constructive capitalist. He was the descendant of merchants, and the son of a clergyman, and he became a Wall Street broker. He rebuilt an empire. The story of his life as told in two volumes by George Kennan is a thrilling narrative, and at the same time one that has the merit of illustrating the major dynamics of modern society, and the development of the great West. No one can read it without being informed valuably on matters it is important to the welfare of this country to have more generally understood. The preparation of the book is therefore a public service, just as the life it presents was a public service. At the time of his death in 1909 Harriman was planning a railroad circle around the globe. Had he lived he might have entered upon the policy of rebuilding Asia. A mere continent was not beyond the scope of his mentality. He was a planetary thinker.

Harriman's outlook on the transportation situation, and what the roads needed in the way of unifying, standardizing, and rebuilding of lines, he himself defined as follows, in an address at the opening of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition:

It was impossible to supply the needs of commerce by the railroads originally constructed and operated. It became necessary not only to reconstruct and reequip these lines, but to bring them under uniform methods and management, which was possible only by the combination and unification of the original short lines of railway into systems, each under one management and control. The combination of different railroads should be regulated by law. So far as may be necessary, the public interest should be protected by law; but in so far as the law obstructs such combinations, without public benefit, it is unwise and prejudicial to the public interest.

He was no wrecker of values for the sake of money or power. Money he did not appraise very highly as a mere possession, but wanted it for what it would accomplish. He was accused of running a corner in Northern Pacific and thus precipitating the panic in which United States Steel and other good stocks were jettisoned by frantic Northern Pacific shorts until general ruin seemed imminent. But this was an error, according to Kennan. In that battle of giants which grew out of the effort to control the Burlington, Harriman and Kuhn, Loeb & Co. quit buying four days before any corner was established; and then he helped the shorts to settle on a basis that saved many from bankruptcy.

One may regard E. H. Harriman as a stock broker who became a railroad man, or a railroad man who had been a stock broker. The latter view is the better. His performances transcended in magnitude and value those of many of the older railroad builders, and entitle him to be known as one of the great creative powers of the country. Says Kennan:

Mr. Harriman's genius was essentially and fundamentally constructive, and no railroad that he ever acquired suffered injury from his management or control. Eight years after his death, when the securities of all railroads had been depressed by hostile legislation and the restrictions of an incompetent commission, the shares of the Southern Pacific and the Union Pacific were selling respectively at 115 and 122, while the shares of the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern were offered at 86 and 85. Traffic statistics, moreover, show that the country served by the Hill system certainly did not develop more rapidly than the country served by the Harriman lines. Mr. Harriman planned and built with the future of the country constantly in mind, and the prices of his stocks, as well as the prosperity of his territory, show how sagacious and far-seeing his plans were and how enduring his influence has been.

If it is creative reality to make two blades of grass grow where but one grew before, it is just as much so to make a railroad haul two blades of grass where but one was hauled before. But that means making it over, and this Harriman accomplished. He just about doubled the working capacity of Union Pacific, and did it again with the Southern Pacific to adjust that road to the altered condition thus created. Such feats were, of course, preceded by long experiences in railroad management, and intensive studies of what such enterprises needed. Into this experience Kennan's biography goes in really fascinating detail. Speaking of the young Harriman's first venture into the transportation field, he says:

The first outward indication of this new ambition was the purchase, in 1877 or 1878, of the steamer Twilight, a small Hudson River boat plying between New York City and Newburgh. This was the first vehicle of transportation that he ever owned or managed, and although it played no important part in his subsequent career, its acquisition was an evidence of his early interest in the carrying trade. He retained possession of it only a short time, but he operated it successfully while he owned it and was able to sell it at a profit.

That was followed by the purchase of a small railroad in northern New York, the Sodus Bay and Southern, which had a terminus on Lake Ontario, and would furnish an outlet to Canada for either the New York Central or the Pennsylvania, whichever wanted it badly enough to buy it. Of this road Harriman himself said:

This property had great strategic value which nobody seemed to recognize. I knew that if I put it into good physical condition, so it could handle and develop traffic, the Pennsylvania Railroad would jump at a chance to buy it, in order to get an outlet to the lake; and that the New York Central would be equally anxious to buy it, in order to keep its rival out. My experience with this railroad taught me a lesson with respect to the importance of proper physical condition in a transportation property which I have never forgotten.

He once referred to himself as "lucky"; but it was too modest on his part. It is not luck when a man accomplishes his objects by such adroitness as this:

In the fall of 1895, for example, Mr. Harriman wished to see one of the races of the trotting association at Goshen. He accidentally missed the Erie train that he intended to take, and there was no other that would bring him to his destination in time except the Chicago express. Finding that this through train made no local stops, he telephoned to the executive offices of the Erie and asked if the express might not be allowed to stop at Goshen as a personal accommodation. Inasmuch as he was vice-president of the Illinois Central and it was customary for high railroad officials to extend such courtesies to one another, this was a perfectly natural and proper request; but when it was referred to the highest authority it met with a curt refusal. Mr. Harriman, however, was a hard man to beat. Learning upon inquiry that the Chicago express could be flagged at Goshen if there happened to be any passengers there who wished to go to points west of Buffalo, he telegraphed a friend in Goshen to buy a ticket for Chicago. Then, at the appointed hour, he took his seat in the express at Jersey City. When the train reached Goshen, it was stopped by a flag-signal for the accommodation of the non-existent passenger for Chicago, and the Jersey-City-to-Goshen passenger got off and went to the race. The high officials of the Erie would perhaps have treated Mr. Harriman with more deference and courtesy if they could have foreseen that in the not distant future he would save the Erie from another bankruptcy by putting up five and a half million dollars of his own money. In that case he "heaped coals of fire" upon Mr. Morgan's head, because the Erie, at that time, was a Morgan road.

It might well be inferred that it would be quite difficult to keep such a man down. He had his struggles, many of which are indicated in the text. But his creative imagination and his fertile ingenuity got him through almost all of them creditably. He did not always have his own way, for he was working and fighting in a hotly contested field, but when he did have it, the world was better off for it. He was impeded, and thereby the country lost much, by the mischievous laws passed by political meddlers under the mandate of popular prejudice and ignorance of fundamental economics, but in spite of that he worked miracles. The judgment of his biographer is likely to be that of his countrymen who can understand:

When Mr. Harriman invested his money in a worn-out railroad, he expected to earn, by personal labor and skill, the profit that he anticipated—and he did earn it. No one now questions the fact that he was virtually the creator of the reorganized Union Pacific; and if he made millions out of it, he added, at the same time, hundreds of millions to the value of the property of other men, and widened immensely the area of human happiness and prosperity.

Most of Mr. Harriman's great fortune was made out of the increase in value of the properties that he managed, and in part owned; but the value was put into those securities by unremitting labor and by the exercise of the rare mental powers and capacities which in the business world always gain the high rewards.

As the Union Pacific and the Southern Pacific had been left by their builders they were full of bottle necks—tight places of one sort or another that prevented the maximum use of the good parts of the road. When he took over the Union Pacific it perilously approached Bill Nye's old description of "two streaks of rust and a right-of-way." Others could see little or nothing in it. Says Kennan:

Mr. Morgan's failure to take advantage of his opportunity to reorganize the Union Pacific is regarded as one of the chief tactical mistakes of his life. He thought that the road had no future, and that it was less valuable than the Erie. Mr. Harriman, on the contrary, with characteristic imagination and judgment, had a clear prevision of its possibilities, and when its common stock was selling below 25 he said to Mr. Otto H. Kahn: "Union Pacific is intrinsically worth as much as St. Paul, and with good management it will get there." This seemed to Mr. Kahn "the wildest kind of wild talk," and he did not at first take the prediction seriously; but in less than ten years Union Pacific was paying 10 per cent. dividends; the stock was selling at nearly 200, and it had left St. Paul far behind. These results, however, were largely if not wholly due to the "good management" of a born railroad builder and executive. Mr. Morgan, with all his great financial ability, might not have been able to make the Union Pacific what John W. Gates said it was in 1901—"the most magnificent railroad property in the world."

Harriman was not much of a gambler and he did no guessing. He went over the line in a special car pushed ahead of the locomotive. He traveled by daylight, and if there was anything important that he didn't see, he asked about it. His observation of details and what they might mean is thus described by Julius Kruttschnitt, after the acquisition of the Southern Pacific:

One day [says Mr. Kruttschnitt] I was walking with Mr. Harriman on the road. He noticed a track bolt and asked me why so much of the bolt should protrude beyond the nut. I replied, "It is the size which is generally used." He said, "Why should we use a bolt of such a length that a part of it is useless?" I replied, "Well, when you come right down to it, there is no reason." We walked along and he asked me how many track bolts there were to a mile of track, and I told him. Thereupon he remarked, "Well, in the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific we have about eighteen thousand miles of track and there must be some fifty million track bolts in our system. If you can cut an ounce off from every bolt, you will save fifty million ounces of iron, and that is something worth while. Change your bolt standard."

To revert to the Union Pacific; there were some bad grades west of Cheyenne, with light track and sharp curves, all prohibitive of heavier equipment and increased capacity. But Harriman calculated that the capacity might be almost doubled by rebuilding certain parts in a certain way, and without very great increases in operation costs—which would turn losses into profits:

This acceptance of Mr. Harriman's plan for the complete reconstruction of the Union Pacific, at an initial cost of $25,000,000, shows how deep an impression his knowledge, ability, and character had made upon the minds of the directors. When he became a member of the board, in December, 1897, he was comparatively little known, even to his associates, but in less than six months his influence had become paramount, and in less than a year (December 1, 1898) he was made chairman of the whole board, as well as chairman of the executive committee, and was practically given supreme control of Union Pacific affairs. The directors, of course, continued to manage the property, but, as a rule, they deferred to the expert knowledge and far-sighted judgment of their chairman in all questions of importance, whether technical or financial.

Then began the labors of a Titan. The condition of the road is well presented in the book, and we can not specify too much, but some faint idea of the work may be gained from these illustrative passages:

He determined, for example, to retire as soon as possible most of the light rolling stock; and in order to prevent useless expenditure of money in repairing it, he directed that not more than ten dollars be spent in putting any single car in order. He also directed the removal of the sides and roofs of old boxcars, in order that they might be used as flatcars in ballasting the track. They were too small and light for freight traffic and he intended to substitute for them cars of much greater capacity. These measures he took on his own personal responsibility, merely for the purpose of saving time and money. In his examination of the road and its equipment, nothing escaped his attention. One of the division superintendents afterward declared, with pardonable exaggeration, "He saw every poor tie, blistered rail, and loose bolt on my division." He even noticed and made inquiries about such comparatively unimportant matters as the diameter of water-tank service pipes, the quality of water furnished to engines, and the effect of unsuitable water on the casing of locomotive fire-boxes.

All together, between Omaha and Ogden, the Harriman engineers abandoned more than one hundred and fifty miles of the old line (an amount equivalent to all of the New York Central Railroad between New York City and Troy), and by rebuilding it in new locations eliminated twenty-two complete circles of curvature and saved nearly forty miles of distance. At the same time the working force widened one hundred and ninety-six miles of roadbed and ballasted it with disintegrated granite; put in almost a million new cross-ties; laid forty-two thousand tons of new and heavier rails on a distance of three hundred and ninety-seven miles, and replaced nearly four thousand feet of old timber bridges with permanent earthen embankments or solid structures of steel. All this was done in the first year and a half of Mr. Harriman's administration. During the same period immense additions were made to the road's equipment. Two hundred light locomotives, which were not powerful enough to haul such trains as Mr. Harriman contemplated, were sold at their scrap value, and were replaced with heavier engines which made it possible to more than double the tonnage of the average train. The rolling stock of the old road consisted of 10,634 freight cars, with a capacity of 400,000,000 pounds. Mr. Harriman added 4760 new cars with a capacity of 325,000,000 pounds, thus nearly doubling the road's carrying power. No such addition to equipment had ever before been made by an American railroad in the short period of sixteen months.

The whole road, from this eastern approach to the Black Hills far out to Medicine Bow on the Laramie plains, shows everywhere the chisel and the straight-edge of the Harriman engineers. There are but two pieces of track—both of them very short—on the entire main line where the forty-three-foot grade is exceeded. Curvature had to go with the heavy grades, and between the Black Hills and the Wasatch Range seven thousand degrees gradually disappeared. At one point the new line, within a distance of four miles, crosses the old one seven times.

After that came the acquisition of the Southern Pacific, and this sort of work upon that road:

The total amount spent on the Southern Pacific system for line changes, grade reductions, and other similar improvements during the period of Mr. Harriman's administration was approximately thirty million dollars, and two-thirds of this sum was used in building the three principal cut-offs, namely, Lucin, Bay Shore, and Montalvo. Twenty million dollars seems a great expenditure for track improvement in only three places; but the saving in operating expenses which these betterments made possible was equivalent to from 8 to 10 per cent. interest on the money invested in them.

He was one of the great builders of the West, coming, in the second generation, to the development of the work of the railroad kings of the 'sixties. Few men have had more influence than he upon the destinies of states—their real destinies, that is; not merely the fate of dynasties, but the life of the people. Says his biographer:

It would be almost as true to say that the reconstructed railroad caused the growth of the country as to say that the growth of the country caused the prosperity of the road. They reacted on each other, but the transportation facilities, under the far-sighted management of Harriman, Kruttschnitt, and Stubbs, were always ahead of the territorial development. In his testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1907, Mr. Harriman himself said, "If we had not had the power to buy the Southern Pacific with the credit of the Union Pacific, the territory tributary to the Southern Pacific would have been ten years behind what it is now."

On a somewhat similar scale, Harriman was a builder of men. He founded the first boys' club in the world, beginning with three boys in the lower East Side in New York. Its membership grew to 7000, and it has been estimated that it has influenced the lives and characters of more than a quarter of a million street boys. At the proper stage of its growth he bought land and put up a building for it at a cost of $185,000. He seldom or never replied to attacks upon his methods or his character, because, he said, he had something more important to do with his time. One would think so. We shall continue this review next week with matter illustrating his vast services to California and the West.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending May 20, 1922, were $144,500,000; for the week ending May 21, 1921, were $130,000,000; an increase of $14,500,000.

Business is better. The depression which began in the United States in 1920 and continued throughout 1921 has passed, and substantial progress has already been made toward normal activity and a new business cycle has been entered upon. Adverse conditions, as the coal strike, may temporarily retard the upward swing, says Stevenson E. Ward, vice-president of the National Bank of Commerce of New York. Other factors, such as widespread crop failures, might even result in recession for a time, but no circumstances can alter the fact that there is now an unassailable basis for confidence in slow and steady expansion of the commercial activities of this country.

It is easy to exaggerate the evils of this situation, however. As a matter of fact, a large volume of fairly profitable foreign trade has been carried on ever since 1918, despite the difficulties encountered. Moreover, although some currencies may never return to their former gold equivalents, the exchanges of those countries in which currency inflation has ceased are now fluctuating through a narrowing range. Certain evidence of the return to normal in the international money market is the gradual decline in money rates everywhere, excepting only some countries of central and eastern Europe and the Far East where political and other conditions are as yet unstable. Money rates in London are again practically at the pre-war level, and British war bonds have crossed par. International monetary and credit transactions can now be carried on between most countries of the world in the normal pre-war ways.

Added evidence of the passing of the post-war uncertainties is the international situation as regards gold. On March 15, 1922, the United States treasury resumed the issuance of gold certificates on ordinary checks. The reappearance of gold and of gold certificates in circulation will have an entirely negligible effect. The step is nevertheless important, as the last artificial currency situation in the United States growing out of the war has ceased to exist. Reestablishment of an unrestricted market for gold in London is being discussed, and the question of a return to the gold standard is also being considered in Sweden. The cheap money advocates in both countries are presenting the usual arguments against this course, but it seems not unlikely that it will be taken in the not far distant future in most countries, the currencies of which are near enough to par with the dollar to make such a step practicable.

Business recovery is never complete until it is conceded on all sides—and then it may have much farther to go before the peak of activity is reached, says Forbes Magazine. The recovery which actually set in a small way last July has been so gradual and has spread in such a leisurely fashion from one industry to another that there are still many doubting Thomases who insist that all trade continues in the doldrums, and who will not make allowance for the time needed to repair a price fabric torn to shreds by the post-war deflation. With some persons, business is either booming or it is "rotten"; they can not visualize the slow, halting forward movement.

So long as there are those who doubt the genuineness of business improvement, Wall Street will be safe for the speculator who is a bull on the United States; for nothing kills a speculation, either for the rise or for the decline, sooner than unanimity of opinion. These are old sayings in Wall Street: "When everybody is bullish, it is time to sell." "Whenever everybody is bearish, it is time to buy."

Of course, there will come a time, in the course of the spring movement now under way when the speculator who is close to the market may better his position by taking profits and awaiting the usual midsummer reaction to repurchase to advantage. But, except for those skilled in reading the surface signs of a weakened technical position which always precede such a reaction, such attempts to catch the short swings are likely to prove disappointing. The market has so recently started upward in earnest and indications that a major bull movement is merely in its Fourth, conditions in basic industries, including agriculture, are improving, and production is expanding. Fifth, gains are not confined to the United States. Conditions are improving throughout the world. Some countries constitute exceptions to this statement, but their bearing on the international situation is not great enough to alter the fact that the world outlook is bet-steel industry, from the railroads, and from the copper mines. But to these indices of improvement may be added the wonderful showing of the automobile industry, where sharply lowered prices have tempted the public to fill requirements for new cars which were deferred during the post-war period of inflation; the rapid development of a building boom which will bring new life to many kindred industries supplying the raw materials, semi-finished, and finished products that go to make complete dwellings and factories; the rising market for oil and gasoline; and the increasing confidence in the cotton and grain markets.

Wall Street was not so much impressed with the fact that the Steel Corporation failed to earn dividends in the first quarter as with the steady increase in profits over three months, which resulted in net earnings of fully $8,505,000 in March, or 85 per cent. better than the January total and larger than those of any month since February, 1921. Since there was a big gain in unfilled orders in March and prices have been advanced all around, there is every reason to believe that profits for the second quarter will be satisfactory. It is estimated in the trade that steel ingot production is now at the rate of 35,000,000 to 38,000,000 tons a year, as compared with 30,000,000 at the end of February, and less than 20,000,000 during December, 1921. Recent predictions are unanimous that the coal strike will not hurt the iron and steel industry, unless it should be prolonged for such a length of time as now seems improbable, since separate agreements have already been made in mid-Western fields and others are likely to follow.

American capital is being used to finance European governments, municipalities, and business enterprises to an unprecedented extent. During the whole of 1921 the total volume of such loans absorbed by American investors was only $628,460,000. During the first four months of 1922 such foreign loans aggregated $508,657,000. In other words, our purchases of foreign securities thus far in 1922 have exceeded $125,000,000 a month, a showing that has never been equaled before in times of peace. Indications point to continued buying on a broad scale, says Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank in its monthly letter.

Foreign loans floated in the United States last year were put out generally on an investment basis of 8 per cent. or better, while similar financing of the last four months has been at materially lower rates—the recent $100,000,000 Canadian government loan being taken on a 5 per cent. basis.

One reason for increased ease in the money market is attributed to the release of foreign-owned funds in New York. We are told that American investors, besides subscribing for the foreign bonds offered here, have made heavy purchases of older issues through London, Paris, and other markets direct.

The easing money situation has led to unusual activities on the stock and bond exchanges; and April witnessed a new high level for the year in both industrial and railroad shares.

Unless all signs fail, 201 Class 1 railroads will show net operating income for March almost equal to a 6 per cent. return on the tentative valuation of the properties as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Preliminary figures given out by 197 of these roads disclose net operating income of $83,374,000, as compared with $47,762,600 earned by all these roads in February and $30,637,000 for the same roads during March, 1921. In order to show 6 per cent. income return in March, the roads would be required to earn $85,895,700 net operating income. It is clear that the exceptional March earnings were due in part to the increased coal traffic developed by the consuming public at a time when it feared a great fuel shortage. But in any event, the railroads are making good progress under efficient management; and heavy investment buying of railroad securities is practical evidence of renewed public confidence.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering a new issue of $4,500,000 Central Coal and Coke Company first mortgage sinking fund gold bonds, Series "A," due serially from June 1, 1923 to 1942.

The Central Coal and Coke Company was incorporated under the laws of Missouri in 1893, succeeding to a business organized and operated continuously since 1871. The company is engaged in the business of mining and selling coal, and manufacturing and selling lumber. Its operations, together with its subsidiary and controlled corporations, extend into Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Wyoming, Louisiana, Texas, and Oregon. It is estimated that the company owns or controls 260,000,000 tons of unmined and recoverable coal and 670,725,000 feet of merchantable yellow pine and hard woods in addition to the 2,500,000,000 feet of timber owned by the Oregon-American Lumber Company.

These bonds, in opinion of counsel, will be secured by an absolute first mortgage on all coal and timber properties now owned or hereafter acquired by the Central Coal and Coke Company or Delta Land and Timber Company, and by pledge of 80 per cent. of the stock of the Oregon-American Lumber Company. The value of mortgaged and pledged property as conservatively appraised and estimated is over $26,000,000.

The William R. Staats Company are offering $750,000 The Kowles Corporation 7 per cent. first mortgage bonds, dated May 1, 1922, in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000. Principal and semi-annual interest payable

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Mr. Doran has had quite a spring-like ebullition of celebrities lately, ranging in kind from Irvin S. Cobb to Phyllis Bottome. Nor does that necessarily express the maximum of the gamut run. It includes at least George A. Birmingham, William Rose Benét, and P. G. Wodehouse. Truly a variegated galaxy. One sympathizes with the strain put on the vocabulary and imagination of Mr. Doran's publicity department. Fortunately, the several bright stars enumerated above do not encroach on one another's orbits. There is room for all in even a press agent's vocabulary, not to mention a book reviewer's. We must confess at the outset that we haven't read all of the Doran publications here listed. We immediately seized George A. Birmingham because he is an old favorite. For the same trite reason we seized Wodehouse and Phyllis Bottome. Mr. Benét's and Mr. Cobb's work, alas, is still strange to us, and we can realize only in proportion to the merits of the other three what we have missed. "Sundry Accounts" and "The First Person Singular," Mr. Cobb's and Mr. Benét's books, respectively, must take their turn in a reviewer's mañana.

"Three Men and a Maid," the latest Wodehouse manifestation, has an indigo-colored jacket to suggest that it is an antidote for the blues. It is the best prescription of the sort since the latest Leacock or the latest Wodehouse, whichever appeared more recently. Probably "Three Men and a Maid" would not stand rereading as does that classically funny novel, "Zuleika Dobson," but at first blush it is delectable. For the benefit of any benighted who do not know Mr. Wodehouse's laugh-raising magic it may be added that his genius is akin to Stephen Leacock's and that his tactics in bombarding the risible muscles are very similar. However, he writes a different genre of novel. It is not pure nonsense, but like Mr. Beerbohm's parody has the semblance of reality. Indeed it is more realistic than most "realistic" novels.

George A. Birmingham's new collection of Irish tales, "Lady Bountiful," is very much on the order of his older stories. That genial genius is always easily delightful and evidently spontaneous. It is a gift. Mr. Birmingham gives more clairvoyant glimpses of Irish peasants, Irish ladies, Irish clergy, Irish doctors, and Irish politicians. His humor is of a much quieter sort than Mr. Wodehouse's. It is very mellow and very real and indubitably will stand rereading—as do all Mr. Birmingham's, prolific though that writer is. Again we wonder how Mr. Doran contrived such a haul.

"The Kingfisher," by Phyllis Bottome, is a serious novel—a very serious novel. We have frequently made the complaint in these columns that many a good novel is spoiled in the last half. That is the tragic fate of "The Kingfisher," a book whose beginnings are as powerful and as beautiful as any work of this generation. It is perhaps too strong to say "The Kingfisher" is ruined by its latter half, but certainly it deteriorates there, for it becomes a romantic novel of manners of, it must be admitted, mediocrity, where it had been the history of mind and soul. Miss Bottome of course continues Jim's history in this maligned part of the book, but the ethereal, airy ways of Violet inevitably stamp their social graces upon Miss Bottome's pages. We think that Jim could and more likely would have found beauty—since it was essential that he should find beauty—in a girl of his own class, or at least of one several strata below Violet's. We disapproved of Violet's match as heartily as did her parents. It couldn't have been worse from their viewpoint or hers. And it mars the verisimilitude of Miss Bottome's fine work that she should introduce this improbable misalliance. The book would have more force, more interest, and far greater homogeneity if Jim's kingfisher had flown from another river barge to his own. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

The will of Alexander Louis Teixeira de Mattos, the English translator of Fabre, Couperus, Maeterlinck, Zola, and several other Continental writers, contains one bequest that will interest those who have in an unguarded moment of enthusiasm lent their favorite books and never had them returned. The estate of Mr. de Mattos was not large, its whole value being less than £3000, and many of his bequests took the form of books. One volume in particular was left to a certain friend and is described as one "which he borrowed many years ago and has not returned."

The report from Genoa of the death of Agnes Castle closes one of the most romantic chapters in recent English literature. A year ago Egerton Castle died, and now his wife's death means the passing of "the Castles" from contemporary fiction. In "Pamela Pounce" (Appleton), which has been published since Mr. Castle's death, appeared the final work of the collaboration which has given so many readers pleasure since the days of "The Pride of Jennico" down. It is interesting that in period depicted and in character this novel marked a return to what first won the Castles fame.

Henri Murger, the author of "La Vie de Bohème," whose centenary has just been celebrated, was the son of a Paris concierge and repairing tailor of German origin. The house of which Murger père was porter was full of well-known painters and musicians and dancers—real Bohemians these—and they petted and encouraged the tailor's urchin. He got his start in life as secretary to the Russian ambassador at the magnificent salary of 40 francs a month. But his ambition was to earn his living with his pen. He succeeded, becoming editor of the Hatter's Journal (a trade organ) at 73 francs a month.

The Oberammergau Passion Play was first acted in 1633.

Lord Dunsany, whose novel, "Rodriquez," is being well received by English critics, has been gathering enough adventures big-game hunting in the Sahara for another book.

The Century Company is publishing this week a number of books of great interest, including "The Laureatians: The Hills of the Habitant," by T. Morris Longstreth; "At the Moment of Death," by Camille Flammarion; "Our Railroads Tomorrow," by Edward Hungerford, and "The Great Secret," by Maurice Maeterlinck.

W. L. George, just before leaving the United States, made the encouraging statement that "American fiction is the greatest in the world, for the modern American author has courage, faith, and hope. He has no charity, for which, in literature, there is no need."

From an English paper we learn that an American edition—publishing house unknown—of Boswell's Johnson is in process of being edited by Mr. Clement Shorter. The new edition will run to ten volumes, is to be superbly illustrated and printed, and will have introductions by Mr. Augustine Birrell, Mr. G. K. Chesterton, Mr. John Drinkwater, and Mr. Walter de la Mare. This de luxe affair called the Temple Bar Edition.

The publication of the fourth and last volume of "The Social Plays of Arthur Wing Pinero" is announced by E. P. Dutton & Co. The two plays in this concluding volume of the series are "The Thunderbolt" and "Mid-Channel," of which Clayton Hamilton, who has edited the group, says: "They may already be regarded as the two greatest plays of British authorship that have been given to the world in the first two decades of the twentieth century; for neither of these impressive compositions has been surpassed by any British playwright, old or young, in the decade that has elapsed since 1909" (the year in which "Mid-Channel" was written). The series is called "Social Plays" through their author's endeavor in the words of Ibsen "to depict human beings, human emotions, and human destinies upon a groundwork of certain of the social conditions and principles of the present day." This grouping separates Sir Arthur Pinero's lighter plays, sentimental comedies, farces, and so on, from these dramas of real importance.

The first attempt to "Bowdlerize" Shakespeare's plays, according to Sir Sidney Lee, was the work of a Spanish priest, Sanchez, who edited the second folio of 1632. Sanchez aimed to strike out all phrases and passages which he considered to be inimical to or inconsistent with the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church. His task was undertaken in the spiritual interests of the students in the English College at Valladolid in Spain, who were being trained under the patronage of Philip II to become missionaries to England. Thomas Bowdler's attempt was different. He published his edition of 1818 under the title, "The Family Shakespeare in ten volumes; in which nothing is added to the original text; but those words and expressions are omitted which can not with propriety be read aloud in a family."

Among the most important publications of the Oxford University Press this month is a large folio containing designs by William Blake illustrating the 1790 edition of Gray's poems. The album was found by Professor H. J. C. Grierson in Hamilton Palace, where it had been lost to sight for a hundred years. Professor Grierson writes that he had seen no collection which illustrates so fully the grace, fancy, and delightful humor of Blake's work. The Oxford edition has been reproduced full size by the colotype process and contains 116 plates in monochrome and six in colors.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

The Sea Gull Library.

There seems to be quite an epidemic of translated short stories. Two new volumes in the Sea Gull Library, an excellent series of translated continental works, are "Daughters of Fire," by Gérard de Nerval, translated by James Whitall, and "The Shepherd's Pipe and Other Stories," translated from the German of Arthur Schnitzler by O. F. Theis. This little series, of which four volumes have been published to date by Mr. Nicholas L. Brown, is to be highly commended. There are other series of translated European classics, but for the most part they stick to the beaten path of familiar standards. The Sea Gull Library, which is edited by O. F. Theis, translator of the Schnitzler stories, aims to translate and edit the lesser-known European writers. The two preceding volumes, for example, are Francis Jammes' "Romance of the Rabbit" and the Danish writer Jens Peter Jacobsen's "Mogens and Other Stories." For any but the most polyglot of readers the Sea Gull Library should be a welcome series.

DAUGHTERS OF FIRE. By Gérard de Nerval. THE SHEPHERD'S PIPE. By Arthur Schnitzler. New York: Nicholas L. Brown; $1.50 each.

The Cook's Wedding.

Those who are collecting Anton Chekhov's work in the Macmillan edition of "The Tales of Chekhov" will welcome the latest volume,

"The Cook's Wedding and Other Stories." Many people who object to the squalor of Chekhov's tragic tales and who happen to know his work only in that guise will be astonished to read these delicate little stories of child and animal psychology. Chekhov is a great artist who divined the human soul as perhaps only a Slavic genius can. But it is nevertheless amazing to find even his touch so light and sympathetic as it is in these tales of Russian child life.

THE COOK'S WEDDING AND OTHER STORIES. By Anton Chekhov. Translated by Constance Garnett. New York: The Macmillan Company; $2.

The Amourette Landscape

A book of long short stories reminiscent of the earlier tales of Henry James, partly because of the subject matter, partly because of the finished suavity of style, is "The Amourette Landscape and Other Stories," by Adeline Adams. The author, who is the wife of the American sculptor, Herbert Adams, has spent her life in and about studios and is acquainted with most of the artistic fry of the day. It is natural that her stories should be concerned with art and artists, and what is more interesting, unlike the young writer who sets out to write of Bohemia, Mrs. Adams knows whereof she writes. It is not a strained effort. It is the natural expression of her environment. The studios of which she writes, like those of Henry James, are not the studios of Bohemia. Artists in these true tales from the life appear as only different from other people in that they are more than ordinarily serious and industrious. Every one who has a conception of artistic life based on movies and best-sellers should read Mrs. Adams' charming stories for their informative value. Every one who likes quiet, unstrained, good writing should read them for pure pleasure.

Two Animal Books.

Two fascinating books of animal life are "Wild Folk," by Samuel Scoville, Jr., and "The Minds and Manners of Wild Animals," by William T. Hornaday, director of the New York Zoological Park. Either of these books is an excellent natural history study, but they may be differentiated as follows: "Wild Folk" is more apt to appeal to young readers—it is really a collection of true animal stories; and again for the person more interested in literature than in animals, Mr. Scoville's delightful stories will still make a strong appeal. "The Mind and Manners of Wild Animals" is a serious treatise of the subject. It is fascinating reading, as natural history usually is, and Dr. Hornaday has some extraordinary things to say about animal mentality. He is a professional zoologist and big game hunter, not a writer; but thanks to his scientific training, his subject matter is well grouped and his book is an orderly as well as intriguing narrative.

Two Books for Children.

Two attractive juvenile publications of Little, Brown & Co. are "Pon-a-Time Tales," by Richard A. Clarke, and "Blackie the Crow," by Thornton W. Burgess, of bed-time story fame. "Blackie the Crow," which belongs to the Green Forest Series of nature books for youngsters of four to twelve, is richly illustrated in many colors and will therefore appeal to even the youngest. "Pon-a-Time Tales" are suitable for older children, particularly girls. They are typical fairy tales of everyday things. The latter volume is illustrated from excellent pen-and-ink drawings.

JEWEL MAP OF FRANCE.

It was during the Paris Exposition of 1900 that there was presented to the French nation by the Czar of Russia the "jewel map" of France, says the Washington Star. It is not only priceless, but unique, because many of the precious stones employed to make it are found in Russia alone, and every one found in those days became the property of the imperial treasury.

The map, which is now in the Louvre, is forty inches square. The waters of the oceans are represented by a whitish-gray marble. The groundwork of the general design is jasper. Portions of neighboring countries are uniformly shown in slate-colored jasper, but the various departments of France, eighty-seven in all at that day, are done in many colors and gradations of color from pure white to deepest red.

It must not be supposed that the pieces of jasper that represent the departments have been shaped "anyhow." They follow faithfully the outlines laid down in official maps of the country. So cunning is the workmanship that no joints show at the boundaries, and the eighty-seven pieces have been fitted together with artistic regard to the effect produced by the contrasting and blending colors.

The rivers of France are numerous and long. In this map they are duplicated by threads of platinum that, sunk in the polished jasper, shine like silver. But to most visitors the chief attraction of the map is the 106 precious stones that mark the cities and towns—these places being indicated also by their names embossed in letters of solid gold.

Naturally, the eye travels to Paris, and there it stops, enchanted by the sight of a magnificent ruby which must be worth a small fortune. It is probably the finest and most valuable stone in the whole map.

Away in the north is Lille, a trifle smaller in size than the ruby—not a diamond, as it appears, but a phenacite, a variety of rock crystal that is very rare. Bordeaux is another large gem that all would mistake for a diamond. It is a very fine aquamarine.

Havre is a splendid emerald, although not so fine as the egg-shaped emerald that marks Marseilles. Nantes sparkles like a tiny pool of champagne, a particularly handsome beryl. Rouen is a sapphire, Lyon a tourmaline, Nice a garnet, and Cherbourg an alexandrite, a stone, I hear, although it looks green by daylight, which by artificial light as a mixture of red and blue.

Of the other towns, thirty-eight are shown in diamonds, quartz crystals and the like; thirty-five are tourmalines and twenty-one are amethysts. The known value of these gems does not help one to estimate the cost of the map, for the finest stones are not in the jewel market. Replacing them with purchasable gems of corresponding size—diamonds, rubies, sapphires, and the like—one might be able to duplicate the map for half a million dollars.

Parisians are eagerly awaiting the appearance of the new fifty-centime coins in bronze aluminum (according to the Living Age). The coins have been officially issued—a very different thing, unfortunately, from coming immediately into general circulation. They have been photographed in the press and some have been turned over to various banks and other institutions. Within a few months they will probably be passing from hand to hand about Paris. The new one-franc and two-franc pieces, which have officially been in circulation for months, are only now beginning to become general in Paris, and the provinces have so far received scarcely any. On the Riviera they are still almost unknown except in a few centres of luxury, and are treated with curiosity mixed with some distrust by the shopkeepers.

More Water

San Francisco's water supply is drawn from three sources—the Alameda branch of the Spring Valley system, the San Mateo County peninsular branch, and the Lake Merced branch.

These three sources, as at present developed, yield an average of 42 million gallons a day.

The maximum summer use from the supply is about 44 million gallons a day. The minimum winter use is about 32. The average use is about 38 million gallons a day.

Between 42 million gallons daily, the total development, and 38 million gallons daily, the total use, there is a very small margin of surplus—much too small a margin for safety.

Development has reached its limit in the peninsular and Merced branches of the system. No more water can be obtained from these sources than is available now.

Development of more water for San Francisco, in so far as the present water supply is concerned, means development of the Alameda branch of the system. It means, to be specific, development of the Calaveras Reservoir in the southern part of Alameda County.

The Calaveras Reservoir development, now under way, will add 24 million gallons daily to San Francisco's supply, making it 66 million gallons daily. This will by no means exhaust the possibilities of Calaveras.

The margin of surplus will be enlarged to such an extent as to anticipate all San Francisco's water uses for a long time to come.

This development—so beneficial to San Francisco—was made possible by a decision of the Railroad Commission in August last year, by the water aqueduct contract approved by the Board of Supervisors, and by the cooperation of this company.

AT THE ORPHEUM.

A varied and quite elaborate Orpheum bill this week partly atones to the habitués, no doubt, for a lack of actual merit in several of the offerings. Over the inaudible little song-let sung by the girl-let, for instance, in Act C we will erect a little tombstone bearing the inscription "Here Lies."

"Hurry-Up Jack" makes amends for its existence because the audience laughed mildly. So thought Vilma that she did, too, but Vilma, my child, you'd better go straight to a specialist and learn how to exercise your diaphragm in stage laughter.

"May and December," another playlet? M—m—m—I like playlets—when they are clever. "May and December," although expensively and elaborately gotten up, is not clever; merely a peg upon which to hang an exhibition of pretty girl in pretty clothes. For Sheila Terry is pretty and attractive, and, yes, she can dance very nicely. But oh, Sheila, dear child, either you should toddle off arm in arm with Vilma to the specialist and buy a voice, or go into the movies, where you would look uncommonly sweet.

Well, let's see; yes, everything else was either amusing or entertaining. Don Barclay in Act D, Marie Clark in Act G, Trixie Friganza in Act I, the Four Camerons in Act F all had those yards and yards of risible nonsense up their sleeves that gets you going so that you can't stop. These acts are perfectly formless, but the composers of the patter—some of it born of the moment in the shape of gags—is founded on a sure perception of what will make vaudeville audiences laugh. We couldn't describe the material, parse it, analyze it, nor label it as anything but nut nonsense; but it is extremely funny. Don Barclay was comic in his take-off of the "I'll slap real hard" type, and Marie Clark gave a real characterization touched up to the nth power with burlesque.

The Four Camerons are first-class trick bicyclists, but the two men are expert vaudeville amusers. They played at "papa" and "son," giving back and forth a perfect fusillade of verbal and muscular comicalities, Louis Cameron being the fun-maker in chief.

Trixie Friganza is the same young Trix, reviving some of her old tricks, touching up some of the later ones, and treating us as handsomely as usual in respect to clothes by gradually removing successive layers of garments until she gets down to a gymnasium suit. And—oh yes, to be sure—Trixie has now comfortably renounced her black wig and appears with her snowy fleece bobbed, somehow making her almost if not quite a younger woman.

A real gem on the programme is the Marga Waldron-George Halprin act. This consists of a series of beautiful dances by the première danseuse, which are executed to first-class piano selections played with high artistic skill by Mr. Halprin. Thus these two genuine artists joined in interpretation of Liszt's "Second Hungarian Rhapsody," the man playing, the woman dancing, with an unusual artistic finish.

I don't suppose anybody got the Tragedy Dance from the programme, for they just give one lightning flash between dances, and then the house is dark. But everything in the act, including the perfectly stunning costumes of the dancer and the piano numbers rendered by Mr. Halprin, was of superlative quality. A single but striking set added a finishing touch, and if an artist should paint the final stage picture, the black velvet curtain, the brilliant red stairway, its color intensively repeated in the plumage of a rarely beautiful live parrot on its perch and in the scarlet-shot costume of the dancer, it would infallibly make a sensation.

BE GENTLE TO THE ERRING.

There has been some discussion of late as to whether the stage director who licks a rehearsing play into shape is justified in berating the rehearsers, damning them, and indulging in savage personalities as a vent for the nervous irritability they have provoked in him.

For coaching a play must be one of the most trying and nerve-frazzling of occupations. I, in an effort to blend individual acting into team work; to make the inchoate flowing and cohesive; to reduce the rough and unfinished to a state of high polish; to make a grove of possibly self-absorbed, egotistic people unite zealously in throwing into prominence a story and characters that are going to leave some of them among the subordinates. It means correcting faulty diction, gestures, attitudes, inflections, intonations. It means planning exits, entrances, groupings, deportment. It means making the murmurers raise their voices, and the shouters lower theirs. It means passing verdicts on the natural hair or the wigs of the performers; on their clothes, and various apparently trifling but really important details about their general mien and actions.

And everything must be timed to the second, for the slightest break in the carefully planned flow of speech and action means a crack in the illusion; the dread of the sensitive player.

Yet it has been demonstrated that all the necessary results can be obtained by the essential qualities of leadership in a stage director unflinched by ebullitions of nervous unreasoning wrath, which antagonize the player and lessen the self-control that he needs to maintain so as to be able to act.

And that, indeed, is the trouble with the violent, hectoring stage director; merely a lack of self-control.

They say that George Foster Platt is one of the best stage directors in the United States. I saw him in action twice; once in 1908, and a dozen years later, when his nervous system might reasonably be supposed to have had considerable inroads made on it. Both times he was the pink of courtesy, and the players responded by equal most careful and willing effort. Not once did he affront a player's self-respect by his method of correction; something which is really unpardonable.

Mr. Platt's is the modern method. Another fine example is Ira Hards, a one-time Californian, now manager for Erlanger. He is the embodiment of consideration, and in staging a play rarely raises his voice. It is evident that the old school shouting-and-damning director is passing away. He is a has-been. He still has place and power, but when he is retired the younger men who will take his place will be expected to get results—which the old-school exponents claim can't be done—without berating offenders. And now it seems that American observers in London report a pacific and courteous, even kindly attitude on the part of British coaching producers, who do not think for a moment of indulging in wrathful bellowings and heated abuse when things go wrong.

On the whole, it seems worth while for the old-style American director to study to acquire self-control.

A RUSSIAN NOVELTY.

A tremendous hit has been made in New York by a group of Russians—entertainers, we will call them—who give a performance at the new Forty-Ninth Street Theatre, which is called by its Parisian name, "Chauve-Souris." The troupe is headed by a Russianized Armenian named Nikita Balieff and his Russian partner, Wavitch.

Balieff, a dozen years ago, had a company of vaudeville artists giving lively and amusing entertainments in Moscow, which achieved such a vogue that the court grandees used to import them occasionally to Petrograd.

Like many another theatrical troupe, the "Chauve-Souris"—a name bestowed upon them during their Paris run, and wisely retained—were scattered like dry leaves in a gust when the war broke out. But Balieff succeeded in gathering some of them—and possibly others that did not belong to the original company—together, and with their apparently casual and entirely unstereotyped comicalities they captured Paris. London, however, did not fall for it, but New Yorkers, especially the professionals of the stage, adore "Chauve-Souris," and liberally patronize it.

The Chauve-Sourisians dance, joke, sing, joke, play, joke, and throw in other features of an original flavor.

Balieff has the showman's instinct, and is well aware that if he can preserve the essence of what made his merry show go in Moscow and Petrograd he can make it go here. And he succeeds. There is nothing formal about it, and occasionally the audience becomes vocal and takes a hand.

And now, we hear, the Chauve-Sourisians, aware, probably, of the friendly and interested attitude of San Franciscans toward the Russian opera troupe, intend to go on an extended tour which will reach as far as this city.

Good for "Chauve-Souris." Only, I think, Balieff will need to coach himself up a little on local slogans, and study the portraits of our most genial and jocose men about town. For in New York there has been, on occasions, a lively rattle of witty personalities from the stage to the audience and from the audience to the stage which greatly added to the general hilarity.

DECAMERON NIGHTS.

"Decameron Nights" has a wicked sound, but a merely conventionally romantic play, made from the welding of several of the Decameron stories into one, has been written by an American theatre manager named Robert McLaughlin.

The astute Mr. McLaughlin evidently recognized the drawing power of his material, but he has retained the picturesque atmosphere and medieval flavor of the original, while carefully eliminating the unabashed candor with which Boccaccio related the detailed love adventures of his characters.

"Decameron Nights," therefore, is an essay in old world, picturesque romanticism. The story sounds like a reversion to drama unaffected by modern tastes. It seems to borrow something from Maeterlinck's strange, haunting fairy-tale dramas, although without their mystic psychology. It is suggestive of the "Arabian Nights," and I shouldn't wonder if Robert McLaughlin had borrowed a leaf from D'Annunzio in planning the stately and ornate setting for "Decameron Nights."

The identity of Willette Kershaw, who plays one of the two leading female rôles, ought to be of some interest to San Franciscans, for she played a prolonged engagement here as leading lady to a stock company out at the Valencia, a year or so after the fire, when there were no downtown theatres. The American actress has been for some time in London, where she has become a favorite. She pleased the Londoners by her assumption of the character of the artless native girl in "The Bird of Paradise," and her name turns up continually in stage news from London.

As I remember her, Willette Kershaw was tall, willowy, very pretty, undeveloped in technique, unremarkable in native talent, but well suited to the stage and full of sex charm. I remember her particularly as making an appropriately alluring appeal in the character of the heroine in Molnar's "The Devil."

A CHILDREN'S THEATRE.

The sapient reporter, who is generally extremely young, even if not tender, is perpetually announcing that such and such a theatrical event is happening for the first time. So it is stated that the first children's theatre in New York City will be inaugurated in August, whereas six or eight or ten years ago a children's theatre was started in the tenement district by some devoted women who wanted to lend wings to the torpid imaginations of the hapless little street denizens in the slum district.

Only a nominal charge was made, the work of planning, selecting, and coaching plays and superintending the construction of sets and costumes being done by these philanthropic women and some volunteers purely as a labor of love. Two women in particular were identified with this work, but I only remember the name of one of them, Miss Hertz.

The children and their parents—such of them as could spare the time—were pressed into service to assist in the work. All the acting was done by children who, in the try-outs, demonstrated the possession of teachableness and talent.

Long lines of blissfully expectant children used to stand in front of the theatre—no doubt improvised out of a vacant store—and great and overwhelming was the disappointment when no more could be admitted, and dozens and scores had to be turned away.

It was a wonderful and beautiful work, and, could it have been organized and widely extended, might have saved the present generation of painfully precocious youngsters from their premature knowledge of various adult emotions in life which should not be suggested to a child's perception.

But it seems that those who had instituted the movement, and upon whose interest and energy the work depended, broke down in health. Your true philanthropist will generally find that work without pay—unless it be of a self-glorifying nature—will receive little coöperation, even from the bored rich who are trying to kill time.

The children's theatre now under way is part of the August Heckscher Foundation, and is being built at Fifth Avenue and One Hundred and Fourth Street. It is to seat 700, will present both picture and spoken plays—all to be chosen for and adapted to the child's taste—and wards of the Children's Society will frequently be trained to play parts. Altogether a most commendable and child-saving undertaking.

THE RUSSIANS IN NEW YORK.

The Russian Grand Opera Company, local notices of which, during its San Francisco engagement, awakened expectation and anticipation in the East, has at last reached New York, after seasons in several of the big cities. Philadelphia seems to have been particularly appreciative, advices from New York not having yet reached here.

The unusual circumstances attending this group of singers has surrounded them with an aura of romantic interest, and rather disposed people to over-estimate their attainments, which, although in some individual cases most admirable, do not collectively reach to those possessed by the singers of the Metropolitan Opera House and the Chicago Grand Opera Company.

But the marked Russian characteristics of the singers and the almost completely Slavic origin of the in some cases unfamiliar operas

Miss Burskaya, who was generally yielded the palm here in San Francisco as the best of the women artists of the company, was praised by a Philadelphia critic for making her Carmen "a sorceress and she-devil incarnate." Miss Burskaya, by the way, has been secured by Signor Merola to sing in the outdoor season consisting of four operas to be given in a few weeks at the stadium at Palo Alto.

American Folk Songs.

Grace Wood-Jess, the American disease, who is said to be doing for the folk songs and stories of America what Yvette Guilbert did for those of France, will make her debut in San Francisco on May 31st before the University Fine Arts Society, in the Hotel St. Francis ballroom.

The visiting artist is a newcomer to San Francisco, but her fame in the East is well established. She interprets American plantation songs and stories and the folklore songs of the old world, her mezzo-soprano voice adding to the value of her interpretation. She sings in the costume of each period. One of the costumes worn by Miss Jess is of special interest, inasmuch as it was once the property of Mrs. Lincoln while she was mistress of the White House. Another is copied from a painting of a French belle of 1700. Miss Grace Adèle Freedy, the composer-pianist, will accompany Miss Jess.

The Columbia Theatre.

The Henry Miller season at the Columbia Theatre enters upon its final week on Monday night with the first production in English of Henry Bataille's play, "La Tendresse." The cast is a distinguished one, headed by the four-star constellation of Blanche Bates, Ruth Chatterton, Henry Miller, and Bruce McRae. Next Saturday night's performance will mark the last one of the season.

The one and only Elsie Janis, who endeared herself to millions of soldiers during the war, will be seen at the Columbia for two weeks, beginning Monday night, June 5th.

In her new song-and-dance show Miss Janis has Americanized some of the successes in which she appeared in London and Paris. Some of the players upon whom Miss Janis depends for her support are Jurien Thayer, Gus Shy, Charles Lawrence, Bradley Knoche, Monk Watson, Herbert Goff, Duane Nelson, W. Dornfeld, Lane McLeod, Red Murdock, Francis Miller, Lewis Reid, James Nash, and Chester Grady. Besides these there are enough pretty girls to give the performance real charm and grace.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Wellington Cross, formerly of Cross and Josephine, one of the best-known teams in vaudeville and musical comedy, is on next week's bill.

Mason and Shaw offer an act of songs and dances called "All for a Girlie."

Frank Wilcox is going to put on an entirely new comedy playlet for his second week's stay here. It is entitled "Ssh-h!" and is said to be quite as intriguing as its name.

Billy Frawley and Edna Louise will offer a one-act playlet called "Seven A. M." Here the author has gone to the hotel lobby and taken the night clerk from behind the desk and the cigar girl from behind the counter and by writing incidents of their lives has made a sketch of accumulating interest with sparkling dialogue.

With her new act, "My Little Bag o' Tricks," Trixie Friganza is to make the Orpheum re-sound with merriment again next week.

Bert and Flo May are aerialists, but this term may be used only as a matter of classification. They are so different from the usual run of aerialists that it would be advisable to place them under some other heading. Their work is full of new ideas.

The Luster Brothers are brilliant in their line. Audiences have called them unique.

Marga Waldron is a première danseuse. A première danseuse is primarily a ballet dancer and a ballet dancer must be at home on her toes. Miss Waldron is assisted by George Halprin.

Revolver and Poem.

It is not so difficult to understand the urge that has driven Mr. Charles Noe Daly to collect 1300 weapons, as he sights down Sergeant Bailey's old four-barreled revolver. Any one who sees him then, says the New York Tribune, knows that it is not a mere bit of iron and wood in his hand, but a magic motion-picture machine that projects for him the same vision that enabled Tennyson to write "The Defense of Lucknow."

"Remember Tennyson's 'The Defense of Lucknow?'" asked Mr. Daly, and began to recite:

Mine! Yes, mine! Counter-mine! Down! Down and creep thro' the hole.
Keep the revolver in hand! You can hear him, the murderous mole!
Quiet, ah, quiet—wait till the point of the pickaxe be thro!
Click with the pick, coming nearer and nearer again than before—
Now let it speak, and you fire, and the dark pioneer is no more!
And ever upon the topmost roof our banner of England blew.

As Mr. Daly recited he had been holding in his hand a four-shot hand-revolving pistol, made by Holland & Holland of London, with the British proof mark on the barrel. It had a large centre hammer with a safety catch and a folding trigger.

"This is the revolver referred to in Tennyson's poem. The episode described occurred during the Indian mutiny, when the residency at Lucknow was undermined by the Sepoys. The refugees knew that this tunnel was being driven, but felt that their only hope of salvation was to wait until the enemy had completed it, and if possible to kill them, as they had to come through it one by one. A guard was left night and day. As the pick broke through Sergeant Bailey was on guard with this revolver. He killed the two Sepoys and their bodies blocked the entrance, saving the residency and the occupants."

It is interesting to note that the year 1483 is the birth date of three such various geniuses as Rabelais, Luther, and Raphael. Rabelais was born in Chinon, which was the historic meeting spot of Joan of Arc and the Dauphin Charles.

The seismograph at Georgetown University is regarded as one of the most accurate and delicate instruments in the world.

Quiller-Couch on Prohibition.

Under enforced prohibition the United States will never produce a great literature, is the deduction that could be drawn from the controversy between the president of the Wesleyan Conference and Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, novelist (known as "Q") and professor of English literature at Cambridge, if one believes the latter's arguments.

The Wesleyan president asked, "Am I, because I am a teetotaler, cut off from understanding all that is good to understand in Swift or in other writers? Is Shakespeare a closed book to me because I am a total abstainer?"

"Yes," answers Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, "I do hold that the total abstainer is in the nature of things imperfectly equipped for high literature because high literature, both in its creation and its full enjoyment, demands total manhood of which teetotal manhood is obviously a modification."

"I speak only of literature," proceeds "Q," "because that, and not omniscience, is the one worldly business in which I can pretend to any competence, but I might widen my position to a national one and ask what kind of civilization our one positively teetotal nation in Europe, the Turk, has." He then cites Turkish rule in Armenia, and mentions Russia as another example of prohibition. "My position," he says, "is that man is in the world to enjoy all that this world can give, so that he use it temperately; that temptation to excess inheres in every pleasure, and that man's business is to understand this and regulate his life accordingly."

Quiller-Couch cites passages from Milton in praise of moderate indulgence in wine, and asks why "Christ gladdened the feast by turning water into wine?"

Finally he calls upon the Wesleyan president to name six great poets and six critics who have been total abstainers.—New York Times.

Changing Russia.

Mr. Arthur Ransome, who has lately returned to this country from Russia, gives an account of the new conditions in Moscow, says the Manchester Guardian. The city is now extraordinarily different from the old Moscow of the Communist experiment, with boarded windows and a few half-empty Soviet shops. It is now under the régime of Tsar Nep, the popular name for Novaya Ekonomicheskaya Politika, or New Economic Policy. Under this new rule the city is feverishly alive. Industrial conscription has gone, and the state is gradually ridding itself of the responsibility of nationalizing the factories. Nearly all the shops are open and are packed with supplies. There is any quantity of food and toys and fashionable clothing. Cafés are open all over the town. The chief cause of it is the worthlessness of the paper money. Money in Moscow decreases in value every hour. Consequently when the small trader sells something he does not put the price of it in the till and let it grow worthless. Instead he rushes out to buy something else, so that he keeps his capital in goods. The fever of buying and selling makes an ugly contrast to the terrible famine of the Volga district. If there were any money or stability behind Tsar Nep of Moscow, people in this country might well ask why some Russians die of starvation while others feast in cafés. But the city's new spurt of life has little enough real warmth in itself, and still less that can be utilized to lessen the horror of the famine on the distant Volga.

Dunning by Suicide.

Can it be possible that Germany is waiting for her creditors to try to collect their debts from her in the Cingalese fashion? What a chance!

The creditor of Ceylon goes to the man who owes him money, holding in his hand neungala leaves, an extremely poisonous plant, and declares that, if not paid immediately, he'll poison himself.

The debtor at once pays up. In other lands he would very likely laugh at his creditor, but in Ceylon there is a law which imposes an enormous fine upon the person who is the cause of another's suicide.

It therefore never happens that a creditor actually swallows the terrible neungala leaves before his debtor. The debtor always pays.

Real Zionism.

The remedy for the distressing condition of the Jews in Eastern Europe does not lie as I see it, in Zionism, which to my mind is a delusion and a snare. The remedy, in my opinion, lies in making every country where the Jew lives his Zion. If the Jews of the Western world, backed by the non-Jews who are opposed to persecution and oppression, will strive for equal Jewish civil and political rights in all lands for all people, the need for Zionism will speedily disappear. That the trend, the world over, is along these very lines is evident. Since the world war, the disabilities of the Jews in Roumania have been wiped out. Under the Kerensky régime in Russia, with one stroke of the pen all anti-Jewish laws were repealed and the Jew was placed on an equality in all matters civil and political with all other Russians. The Bolsheviks, with all their sins, have not changed the civil or political status of the Jew, established by Kerensky. Today the Jew in Russia, for the first time in its history, can live in any part of Russia, can hold any position under the government, can own and cultivate land anywhere in that country; and the records will show that many Jews are now engaged in Russian agriculture and that the number of Jewish farmers in that country is steadily increasing.—Harris Weinstock in a Letter to the American Hebrew.

Do you read cigar advertisements?

There are a great many cigar advertisements in the papers these days, and most of them, as you have probably noticed, talk a lot about "Mild Havana," "Havana Blend," "Havana Filled," in fact you'll find the word "Havana" stuck in somewhere in almost every one.

We are more fortunate than a good many other cigar advertisers because we have a real story to tell about Gato, and we are going to tell it to cigar smokers who like a cigar that is all pure Havana leaf through and through. Read the story in "Gato Gossip" every week.

VANITY FAIR.

It is a relief to report a sensible thing from London femininity. According to a cable to the New York Herald—it was as novel as that—a tremendous agitation has been caused in women's circles because Englishwomen refuse to adopt long skirts and wasp waists as commanded by the Paris fashion designers. We fail to see just the reason for the tremendous agitation. We should suppose that if Englishwomen did not wish to wear long skirts and cinch their waists, all they would have to do not to do it would be not to do it. But that might be insufficient justification for a cable dispatch, so let it pass. The agitation, after all, seems most violent among some of the smarter West End shops which have gone long of fashionable Paris gowns, to find that their customers sensibly decline to buy them. They will have to be remodeled; and any one who knows how a London shopkeeper loathes you when you don't buy his goods, or how he or any other Englishman hates to change his plans, can understand the flow of Episcopalian profanity which must have floated out on the atmosphere of Bond Street from the doorways of the shops that trusted to a shift of fashion once too often. Certainly it is to be hoped that the short skirt has come to stay. Nothing since Sapho and Zaza burst upon the world twenty years ago has done so much to add zest to life, to make our streets attractive and to give interest to windy days, muddy pavements, and the loading of street-cars. The circumference of the waist is of minor importance, although it has its interest. But the short skirt is a matter of national, nay of international, joy and pride. To the too thin or to the too fat of ankle, to those of billiard-cue formation or built on the plan of beef-to-the-hoof, to the conspicuously knock-kneed or bow-legged, it has been trying. But wide and careful observation at street crossings and other places of vantage convinces us that they are in the minority. The vast majority of women have curves and contours worth revealing, which "twere shame in this clay carcass prisoned to abide," or something to that effect. These modern rompers are great. A return to the old street sweepers of twenty years ago is unthinkable. Look at the Charles Dana Gibson pictures of that epoch, and laugh. Why should women surrender anything they have attained of additional beauty, sanitation, and comfort for the sake of the Paris dress-makers or the silk mills of Paterson, New Jersey? The short skirt is a sensible thing, and the women that refuse to lengthen it are sensible women. It has gone about far enough, however. When Coney Island opened this month four girls appeared in skirts made of straw, and were chased to their dressing-rooms. We should think they would have been chased farther than that.

Meanwhile Lady Doyle, wife of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, says that in Heaven women will not wear anything at all. Not even a sheet. That has long been our notion of it. We can not conceive of ghostly clothes. It seems necessary for a returned spook to wear a sheet when materialized, but possibly that has been a mistake of the mediums; they have made a few. Lady Doyle says every woman will be twenty-five years old, and very beautiful. How, then, will some of them be recognized? She does not say. But the gray hair and the wrinkles will disappear, and the lime that has hardened the arteries of age will be left in this world. That is a good arrangement, and it will stop all this fuss about high blood pressure. Wan cheeks will be rosy once more. And the matter of second wives is all straightened out, to the great comfort of many a remarried person. How many women have feared to die because they did not know which husband of two or several they might have to hook up with? Well, it is going to be all right. If we can dodge Deacon Voliva's orthodox hell we shall find things neatly arranged. Every woman will find her true soul mate. When one thinks of the trouble that has been caused and the time that has been lost through soul-mate hunting in this world, it is evident that Lady Doyle's Heaven is going to afford great relief and more time for business. Says Lady Doyle: "If a man finds his true soul mate in his second wife, his first is not unhappy. She may love him always, but she will have found some one else there whom she loves even more deeply. In Heaven there is a soul mate for every man and woman." Well, that's fine. That bears the rosy promise of hope to every old maid. And all so simple. It is a revelation. If anything is lacking it can be added. All these things, and more of like nature, are being taught by Lady Doyle to her children, aged thirteen, eleven, and nine. This is an idyllic example of the sweet nature of the home, and the value of home education.

Meanwhile, also, over in London's East End they are not bothering about the length of skirts nor the lingerie of spooks, but the soul-mate problem goes on as usual. Mrs. 'Awkins says of Mrs. 'Arris, who lives in the same court: "Ere's Mrs. 'Arris wiv a fresh-blacked heye, an' 'er 'usband three months in goal. Scan'lous, Hi calls it."

Back in 1912 James Doyle of Everett, Illinois (no relation to Sir Arthur and Lady Doyle), hired a mule of J. R. Morris of Meersfield. When Morris tried to get it back he had to replevin it. The sheriff's deputy appears to have seized the wrong mule. At any rate, Doyle said he got a four-year-old when he should have taken a two-year-old; and he took an appeal, or brought a new suit or something of the litigious sort, to recover his right and proper animal. The extra two years did not seem a detriment, although the mule was brought thereby two years nearer the grave—inasmuch as, according to a classic author, "no one ever saw a dead mule or a dead plumber." This mule, however, died. Which mule? Impossible to say whether it was Doyle's or the one belonging to Morris. That did not stop the litigation, for whichever mule died there was one left; a mule whose precise age was in dispute and incapable of being settled by two years. Four times the case was tried and appealed, and two of the judges who had to hear it died. Perhaps in Lady Doyle's Heaven they have found James Doyle's mule and long ago have determined that it was Morris'; or they have found Morris' mule and now know it was Doyle's; or that Doyle's mule is Doyle's and is dead, or that Morris' mule is Morris' and is not; or that Morris' mule is dead and Doyle's mule still lives—O hang it, let Lady Doyle settle it. Morris died in Paris, the other day, and in Lady Doyle's Heaven we have no doubt his soul rejoined his mule; if it was his that died and not Doyle's. But the court and Doyle ought to be apprised of the true state of the case. It is up to some medium now to announce with a few hee-haws which mule is which, and stop the mounting bill of costs.

A WILD HORSE OF THE SAN JOAQUIN.

TO THE NEW YORK HERALD: The spectacular wild horse of the Western plains belongs to fiction, as you say, but I know one true story of the kind.

In the early '60s my father was in charge of my grandfather's cattle herds of more than 6000 grazing animals on the San Joaquin plains in California.

The original Indian ponies were descendants from mares and stallions escaped from the earliest Spanish explorers and conquistadores, and those horses were descended in Spain from old Moorish stock which had its origin in Arabia. The animals were comparatively small, but possessed the Arab's unwearied energy and great carrying ability. It was that stock that became the Indian pony of the lands west of the Mississippi, the wild horse of the Far West, the smaller cayuse of the Oregon and Washington country. Naturally it degenerated in appearance through lack of special selection in the sires, but it retained its stamina and small feet to a remarkable degree. I recall seeing a broncho of this strain at the end of a ride of 114 miles completed in one day from Arroyo Grande to Santa Barbara carrying a rider who must have weighed about 150 pounds. That was in the '80s.

There was one splendid, fleet animal roving the Sierra foothills of the east side of the San Joaquin in the early '60s, and rewards were offered for his capture or killing, as this rather mythical Adonis in horseflesh continued to make night forays down into the valleys and lure away small herds of admiring range mares.

I recall my father relating in 1879, not long before he died and many years before any wild horse fiction stories, his personal experiences in the pursuit and eventual capture and subduing of this great wild stallion, and later verification has come to me in conversation with old timers of the plains of that period when my father, then champion rough rider and ropeman of the Far West and international champion over the greatest horsemen in Mexico, was known as Judge of the Plains and King of the Plains.

He glimpsed the wild stallion once in daylight and rode hard in pursuit, hoping to get close enough to throw his riata. But the wild stallion had too much start and was too fleet in the rough going. The day was very hot and the fine animal used in pursuit practically was ruined by that day's tremendous efforts. Selecting the best horse in his herd and biding his time in the foothills, my father later succeeded in coming upon the wild stallion at comparatively close range.

He gave pursuit and rode hard till he cornered the animal in a cañon, somewhere in the vicinity of the Stanislaus River, I think, and there lassoed him. He had a thrilling struggle, but got the captive to camp, later broke him to saddle and kept him for a period in boxstall seclusion in Stockton, grooming and accentuating the magnificent coat and flowing mane and tail. Then he took him on the river boat down the ninety miles or more to San Francisco and spectacularly rode him up Market Street.

Practically it had cost two fine and very fleet horses to capture this wild stallion, and my father's thought was to keep the captive as a personal saddle animal. But an agent for Barnum's saw the horse, paid a tempting price for him and took him East. Perhaps there are still living among the New York Herald's readers some who recall seeing that stallion, if he survived the trip and was exhibited. None, I think, could forget such an animal.

My father's description of him was: a proud, arch-necked, loud-snorting, beautiful animal with coal black coat and snow white mane and tail of remarkable length. Personally I should like to learn of the ultimate fate of that animal.

Doubtless this one true story of a great wild stallion, possibly the colt of some mare of quality lured away when in foal and not actually an original wild horse, was the foundation for Rufus Steele's Saturday Evening Post story a few years ago of a somewhat similar wild horse supposed to have been captured many years later in Nevada. This one fact may have prompted also the recently filmed story of "Wildfire," by Zane Grey. NEW YORK, May 8th. ARCHIE RICE.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

"Curious, how many more women marry than stay married," said the observant person. "Yes," said the reflective one. "If they would take as much pains with their cages as they do with their traps they would have better luck with their birds."

The latest Melba yarn has it that the song-bird turned up unexpectedly at a charity café-chantant, and the honorable organizer in doing the amiable nearly fell over herself. "Every one wants to hear you sing badly," she gurgled. "Then they won't," said the dame, "because I can't."

A speeding autoist was haled before a local justice who imposed a fine of fifteen dollars. The culprit drew a roll of bills and peeled off three tens. "Here," the justice called after his departing back. "There are thirty dollars here!" "I know it," said the released autoist. "I am going out of this town faster than I came in."

An incident that Sir Ernest Shackleton always repeated with glee was the reply one of the Irish members made to him when Shackleton asked: "Can you imagine the enormous extent of those vast Arctic snow fields?" "Yes," replied the Irish member, "I had the same sensation the first time I appeared in public wearing a dress shirt."

One of Judge's prize stories is as follows: An American doughboy, captive to a Boche officer, was questioned: "How many of you American soldiers are there on this side of the Atlantic?" queried the German. "Oh! About three million of us." "It must have taken a lot of ships we knew nothing about to bring all of you over, didn't it?" "Oh, no; only one ship brought us over." "Only one! Impossible! And what one was that?" "The Lusitania."

There was a popular Kitchener legend that the great K. of K. was a woman hater. A well-known woman who was a great friend of Kitchener's twitted him one day with his dislike of the fair sex. "Anyway," said his friend, "you must confess you always keep them at a distance." "Perhaps," was K.'s answer. "But you know the old proverb—Familiarity breeds contempt!" "Well, Lord Kitchener," replied the lady, "it takes a certain amount of familiarity to breed anything."

Smith, having learned from an obliging neighbor that his wife was at a movie with another man, rushed to the theatre and appealed to the manager for assistance. The latter, wishing to preserve the public peace and his own patronage, went out to the stage and announced: "There is present in the audience a man with some one else's wife. I wish to avoid scandal and so will have the theatre darkened while this couple leaves." The lights were put out and half of the audience rose to depart.

Bobby's mother was anxious to know whether he had obeyed her injunctions and behaved himself at the party. He was sure that he had. "When Mrs. Smith asked me if I wanted more cake, I said, 'No, thank you.'" His mother was relieved, but wanted to know more. "Did she ask you again?" "Yes, and I still told her, 'No, thank you.'" But after awhile she asked me another time. "And what did you answer that time?" Bobby looked confident. "I said what pa always says—'I take the darned stuff away!'"

One of the Japanese delegates to the Washington Conference said that the present mutually suspicious attitude of nation to nation reminded him of the ignorant Japanese peasant who was taking his first journey by rail. "Give me a ticket to Wawa," he told the station agent. "Single or return?" he was asked. The traveler looked suspicious and the agent explained. "Now, do you want a ticket that will take you there and bring you back, or not?" But the green traveler thought it a poor arrangement. "Why the devil should I want to be brought back when I am here now?" he demanded.

Two war stories attributed to Marshal Foch during his visit here are as follows: At a dinner in Washington the French soldier said: "An aged veteran of the Franco-Prussian war was talking to a young veteran of the world war. 'Let 'em brag as they will about modern fighting,' said the old veteran, 'the Franco-Prussian was the war for me. Hardships! Up to your neck in snow! I tell you, solderin' was solderin' in them days.' 'Ah, but you ought to have seen our trench warfare,' said the young veteran. 'Up to our necks in water! I tell ye, solderin' was sailerin' with us.'" At a similar function in New York the marshal was lost in admiration of the American spirit. "It was a new spirit," he said, "a new dauntlessness that Europe had never seen the like of before. This new spirit was brought out by a doughboy. 'Are you ready to die for your country?' a minister asked him. 'Not much,' the doughboy answered. 'I'm going over there to make a couple of dozen Heinies die for theirs.'"

A Korean who had been in mission service for a number of years was at last discovered to have two wives—a very common practice in Korea. It was the duty of the mission board to admonish the bigamist and persuade him to put away his second wife. The Korean demanded a Bible statement to the effect that his course was sinful. The Bible was ransacked, but for a time fruitlessly. Finally, a devout Korean brother produced a text that he announced was indisputable evidence that two wives were contrary to Bible theology, and thereupon read: "No man can serve two masters."

A Westerner who had never seen the ocean went to a small resort on the Atlantic coast for a rest. Shortly after his arrival he asked the proprietor of a little fish house for two pails of sea water. The storekeeper obligingly gave them to him and was surprised to be paid for his services. That afternoon he approached the fish shop again, pails in hand. "My doctor out in Nebraska told me to bathe in sea water twice a day," he explained. Then he happened to observe the distant beach line at low tide, and added, "Gosh! You've done a big business today, haven't you, mister?"

THE MERRY MUSE.

Mrs. Miles' Self-Help.

(In an interview with a correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, Mrs. Eustace Miles blames the morning meal for matutinal peevishness.)

"The lighter the breakfast the clearer the brain"—How cheerfully runs Mrs. Miles's refrain! But a notable dictum she further lets fall: "The best of all breakfasts is nothing at all." Then why stop at breakfast? The logical Punch would also impose an embargo on lunch, and boycott the habit of five-o'clock tea. A gluttonous extra, as all must agree. Like the Snark, in the poet's delectable lay, We should all of us "dine on the following day," And aim at dislodging Black Care from the crupper

By a rigid and total abstinence from supper. This blessed arrangement, if closely one looks, Dispenses with kitchens and ranges and cooks; It simplifies life and encourages thrift, And, seeing the race is today to the swift, It follows that he will be ruler and master Who starts by commanding the speed of the faster.

—Punch.

Another Van Dyck?

What is confidently believed to be a priceless art treasure has been discovered in Santa Barbara, says the Santa Barbara Morning Press. A painting encrusted with the grime of centuries purchased several months ago by John R. Southworth of Casa Covarrubias, 715 Santa Barbara Street, in a second-hand store on Blackfriar's Bridge Road, London, was taken from its frame and cleaned by him during the past week and turned out to be a picture of rare beauty. He showed the painting to a number of artists, among them L. E.

Brougier, who identified it as an Dyck.

The title of the picture is "Martyrdom," and it shows the figure of a nude man being thrust upon a blazing fire by a number of men whose garments reflect the red of the blaze. The anatomy of the picture is declared to be perfect.

The stock yards in Chicago, which are the largest in the world, have twenty miles of streets, and the same number of miles of water troughs, with fifty miles of feeding troughs, and seventy-five miles of drainage. The yards will accommodate over 20,000 cattle, 20,000 sheep, and 120,000 hogs at one time. They cost over $10,000,000.

An Ample Ancestry.

In the well-known lines Matthew Prior was content with Adam as the root for his family tree—"Can Bourbon or Nassau claim higher?" remarks the Manchester Guardian. On this argument we all ought to be satisfied, but it is a social certainty that many of us are not. Adam goes a little too far back; his progeny is too numerous to be exclusive. For real distinction we must strike the tree a little higher up; at its root we are all level with the ground. Then how would Charlemagne do? The ex-Emperor Charles was not above claiming descent from him, and the Hapsburgs were certainly exclusive enough for all ordinary tastes. But even so recent a celebrity as Charlemagne seems to be a doubtful sort of acquisition. An American genealogist has fastened on the lady called Isabel de Vermandois, who flourished about the beginning of the twelfth century. This Isabel, in contributory strains, was descended six times over from Charlemagne. She married as her second husband a descendant of King Alfred; and after that the fountain of honor seems to have launched out into a waterfall. On this American estimate her descendants (and therefore those of Charlemagne and Alfred) have filtered through to virtually every family in England. The result seems to be more like a head of hair than a family tree. In one of an incredibly numerous series of strains King George V represents a twenty-seventh generation from Isabel. Abraham Lincoln, George Washington, and Theodore Roosevelt had all got their perch on other branches; and "a farmer named Parr in New York State" can claim connection with both of Isabel's husbands as well, apparently as an independent but tributary line that goes straight back to the Kings of Wessex. This is all very alarming; even Charlemagne is evidently not of much use to the social climber. The longer the line the less exclusive it becomes. Can it be that the safest thing to do is to claim no more than a distinguished father—or grandfather at the most—and that we should pride ourselves, not on the length, but on the brevity of our ancestral line? Strike farther back than a great-grandfather or so and, however distinguished the original strain, the duke may be sharing it with his dustman.

Miss Marie Bjelke Petersen, who in point of sales bids fair to become the Marie Corelli of Australia, has recently had her latest book, "Dusk," published in London by the Messrs. Hutchinson. The Nation and Athenaeum rates the book as one of the leading novels of the season. Previous successes have been "The Captive Singer" and "The Immortal Flame." Miss Petersen's field is always Tasmania, and the novel she is working on now has its locale in the myrtle forests of that country.

Death of W. C. B. de Fremery.

William C. B. de Fremery died May 20th at his residence, 77 Fairmont Avenue, Oakland, at the age of eighty-nine years. A native of Holland, De Fremery came to San Francisco in 1854 by way of the Isthmus. He was an active member of the Vigilantes under the leadership of William T. Coleman. He founded the old firm of De Fremery & Co., in its day one of the leading importing concerns in the city. He is credited with being a pioneer packer of California fruits.

Life's little complexities continue to increase. For instance, in free Ireland it is proposed to restore the Gaelic name for Queenstown, in the county of Cork, said Gaelic name being "Cobh," which is pronounced "Cove." Oh, very well. Belfast, we suppose, will be something like "Woopf," pronounced "Ouch," and so on. But please feed the world these changes a few at a time.—Chicago Daily News.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Silver Prophecy.

When the great loneliness steals on me like shadow
And the whirl of cities is a dream that is lost;
I shall not light a fire, nor at the window
Watch the golden starlight of the frost.
I shall wander through the deep, frozen dusk
Like a shadow through a mirror's intricacies;
I shall gaze on the porcelain leaves of trees,
The silver rime glimmering on the eaves.

The wind will be full of silver needles,
The wind will be a keen and glittering rain,
I shall wander through the deep, frozen dusk
And my face shall glow with the stars of pain.

And there will come a crying in me,
And the whole grey world will peel and cry;
I know that the heavens will swing above,
And silver hoarfrost bells sweep by.

The dusk will be hung with the silver mists
Of a mute oblivion, and I shall go Far where dark silence calls on great white hills
Over the blue wastes of silver snow. . .
—Oscar Williams in "The Golden Darkness."

The Painters of the Sky.

Beyond this world of beauty and delight
There is a place where ships make into port;
Where artist souls may work with all their might
That evening skies with glory may be wrought.

Today perhaps a Turner used his brush,
The sky all crimson-gold and flecked with light,
While scattered pink clouds in the evening hush,
Were nyrurring from the chill and dark of night.

And then tomorrow a gentle, pastoral soul
May paint a sunset full of home and peace,
Where grays and blues and violets shall unroll
The harmonies of light that never cease.

But I have seen the heavens all piled with snow,
Behind whose pure delight of sculptured line,
I know the hand of Michael Angelo
And felt his master spirit in the wind.
—Virginia Taylor McCormick in "Star Dust and Gardens."

The Cave by the Sea.

Among the great rocks at the end of the beach
There is a great cave that I never can reach,
Nor should any boy who is smaller than I
Climb up, as I do, to look over and spy
The tide flowing in or the tide flowing out,
And crabs in the kelp, perhaps, scuttling about!

For once I discovered, deep down in a place Near the mouth of the cave, what I thought was a face
Looking up through the water, and watched it to know

If it moved or the tide only made it seem so.
But the waving of hair I was sure I had seen—
At least if the hair of a mermaid is green.
—Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer in "Many Children." Published by the Atlantic Monthly Press.

The Toughest Glass Yet.

A Czech engineer, Dr. Vaclav Horak, reports the Gazette de Prague, has invented a new species of glass, which, though not absolutely unbreakable, seems to be the toughest specimen of its kind produced—a creation against which the destructive powers of man appears about as impotent as the kicks of a fly against the Pyramid of Cheops. Dr. Horak has spent twelve years on evolving this obstinate article—or, to be quite accurate, seventeen years in making it, and the last twelve months, aided by friends and enemies, in trying to break it.

The new glass is called "silex," and it would appear that if you want to bend a bar of iron you must give it a clout on the head with a piece of silex. At a recent display of its properties before the leading business men of Prague, Dr. Horak took a frail-looking hollow stick of the glass and drove several

In the testing stages the workmen of the Sazava Glassworks, where the glass is made, used to play football with a light, hollow ball made of silex, and the ball generally emerged at the end of the game considerably less impaired than the players.

Wolf and Lamb Up to Date.

Here is the latest version of the tale of the Wolf and the Lamb, says the New York Tribune.

Taking advantage of the universal disorder, the wolf one day left the woods. He met a lamb that quietly grazed in the meadow.

"I'm going to eat you," he said simply. "No use asking explanations. I don't do it out of malice or vengeance. I am a wolf, thou art a lamb; that suffices."

The lamb asked for five minutes' respite and ran straight to the seat of the Society for the Protection of Animals, where it made known its case. "We are here," they answered, "to protect the animals from men, and not from other animals. If the wolf wants to eat you nothing can be done. It is the law."

Filled with despair, the lamb returned to its doom. On the way it met an old he-goat, who, on learning the lamb's misfortune, was seized with great pity. He took it to his house and powdered its fleece all over with pepper until the white lamb had turned black. "Go now," said the old goat, "and don't be afraid."

The wolf waited, full of confidence. It was difficult for him to recognize the lamb, but he snapped at it all the same. Immediately he choked and his eyes filled with tears.

"Get off!" he said, releasing his prey. "There is no longer justice in the world. It is the end of everything."

And, with his tail lowered, he went back to the woods.

What does the fable teach? The answer may be suggested by the circumstance that this version appears in a Bulgarian paper—and Bulgaria is supposed to have had a narrow escape from being despoiled by Greece.

Celluloid, from which many toilet articles and imitations of ivory are made, is composed from the cellulose found in cotton cloth or raw cotton. It is treated with a solution of nitric acid which forms it into a pulp very much like paper pulp. It is then washed with water, which removes most of the acid. It is partly hardened and camphor gum is mixed with it, when it is rolled into sheets and thoroughly dried. In order to manipulate it, it is softened by steam and then hardened by drying. Celluloid is very inflammable. Wearers of celluloid combs and other ornaments should not expose themselves to fire.

Before the European war a million Austrian kronen were worth $200,000. They are now worth $120.

FRANKLIN. SAVER OF DAYLIGHT.

Daylight saving is commonly regarded as a British device, because it was proposed and practiced in that country some years before its trial here. But now it appears that it was a "Yankee notion" of ancient date, having been devised by no less an authority than Benjamin Franklin when he was the American Minister to France. A writer in L'Intransigeant recalls that, on April 26, 1784, there appeared in Le Journal de Paris a letter from the great American philosopher, in which he set forth his conception of the daylight-saving idea.

He related that one night, after tarrying with friends until a late hour, he went home at 3 o'clock in the morning and retired, hoping to have a long sleep. But very soon he was awakened by the noise made by his neighbors in the apartment overhead.

"I was astonished," he said, "to see my room lighted, and thought first that a dozen lamps had been lighted, but upon rubbing my eyes I realized that my servant had forgotten to close the shutters, and that the sun was rising. I looked at my watches, which were going well, and saw that it was only 6 o'clock. As I found it extremely extraordinary that the sun rose so early I consulted my almanac and read there that the sun would continue to rise earlier every day until the end of June."

"This suggested to me several serious reflections. I considered that if it had not been for the accident that shortened my sleep I would have slept six or seven hours longer, and that many persons were every day doing the same. Let us suppose there are in Paris 100,000 families, each of which consumes half a pound of wax candles an hour; this consumption would go on during six months, with a daily mean of seven hours, which, for the 100,000 families of Paris alone and the 128,000,000 hours, represents 64,050,000 pounds of wax, at the average price of 30 sous a pound, an annual expense of 9,675,000 Tournois livres.

"What a discovery and what a saving," cried Franklin, "if the Parisians could be persuaded to live in summer only in daylight! But how convince them?"

And Franklin proposed three means:

"First—To put a tax of one louis on every window that had shutters preventing the light from entering the rooms as soon as the sun was on the horizon.

"Second—To establish a law to diminish the consumption of wax and candles; to put guards in the stores of wax chandlers and not permit a family to purchase more than one pound a week.

"Third—Have all the bells of the churches ring at sunrise, and, if need be, have cannons fired in every street to open the eyes of the lazy people to their interest."

The means employed in our days are quite different.

The term "under the rose" implies secrecy. It had its origin B. C. 477, when Pausanias, commander of the fleet of Spartans and Athenians, was intriguing with Xerxes for the subjugation of Greece to Persia and for the hand of the king's daughter in marriage. The business was transacted in the "Brazen House," the roof of which was a garden making a bower of roses. Hence the term sub rosa.

The people of the earth speak 3424 languages or dialects.

A Destructive Decision.

The Southern Pacific Railway system is practically and essentially a unit. But technically it is a composite made up of links, some of them under the name of the Southern Pacific Company, others under the name of the Central Pacific Company. The two organizations, while under the same ownership and working to the single end of creating a unified system of transportation, were differentiated in name for reasons connected with the financing of construction at different periods. There is not, nor has there ever been, anything concealed in connection with the matter, or any question as to the legitimacy of employing two names in promotion of a single purpose. The system was created long before the Sherman anti-trust law came into force in 1890, and it has been maintained in operation now for nearly fifty years. To all practical intents and purposes the Southern Pacific Railroad and the Central Pacific Railroad, in their connections and interlacings, and in their ownership, are one and the same.

All this becomes plain to whoever will examine a map of the system. Yet, when the various links are shown, there is presented a complicated weaving of jointed lines. The road from Sacramento to Ogden appears in the name of the Central Pacific. Similarly, the line from the Oregon boundary down the east side of the Sacramento Valley to Sacramento, from Sacramento by way of Niles Cañon to Oakland, the Bay ferry system, the line from Oakland via Niles to San Jose, the line south from Stockton to Goshen, etc.

Under the name of the Southern Pacific are the lines from Oakland to Santa Rosa, Calistoga, San Francisco via Davis to Tehama, down the west side of the San Joaquin Valley from Oakland to Goshen, what is known as the Coast Route to Los Angeles, with numberless feeders connecting, some with the Southern Pacific, others with Central Pacific links. While all are parts of a unified whole, regarded separately they present the spectacle of detached lines with no common terminal and in many instances with no means of connection with any terminal.

Several years ago agents of the Federal government, under authorization of the Sherman anti-trust law, took the ground that the system, so far from being a unit, was made up of separate and distinct properties, and that their operation as a unit was in effect the misuse of competitive systems to the end of maintaining a scheme of monopoly in transportation. For several years the case has been before the courts, and on Monday of this week there was handed down in the Supreme Court at Washington a judgment sustaining the government's claim. Thus, whatever the facts may be, it becomes the law, expressed in an order of court, that the Southern Pacific and the Central Pacific lines shall be dis severed and their coöperative relationship annulled. To do it will be to destroy a unity essential to regular and orderly transportation in California. It will leave both the Southern Pacific and the Central Pacific lines in the air, so to speak, since each is dependent for effective operation upon the use of tracks owned by the other. In effect it will mean that California will be isolated from Oregon; that all eastern traffic over the Central Pacific must go via Niles Cañon and Stockton; that the more important Sacramento and San Joaquin Valley towns will connect with San Francisco only through Stockton and Niles; that Lathrop, Modesto, Merced, and other valley towns will be off the Southern Pacific line from San Francisco to Los Angeles; that various Sierra foothill towns (Placerville, Oakdale, and others) will be isolated, since they connect only with Central Pacific lines; that the East Bay towns south of Oakland will be isolated from Southern Pacific connections, etc. Truly a sad mess it will be, vastly disturbing to traffic both of passengers and freight, vastly inconvenient and vastly costly all around.

A decree by the Supreme Court under ordinary circumstances becomes a finality, but in the immediate instance there is reasonable ground for hope that disaster—for it would be nothing short of disaster to the interest of the public—may be averted through action of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, under the Transportation Act of 1920, holds an authority in matters of this kind even beyond that of the Supreme Court. This act (the Transportation Act of 1926) directs the commission "as soon as practicable" to "prepare and adopt a plan for consolidation of the railway properties of the continental United States into a limited number of systems." The act further provides that the carriers affected may consolidate their lines in accordance with such final plan, and in such case also provides that "they are hereby relieved from the operations of the anti-trust laws * * * and of all other restraints or inhibitions by laws, state or Federal, in so far as may be necessary to enable them to do anything authorized or required by any order," etc.

In pursuance of the Transportation Act of 1920, the Interstate Commerce Commission has already agreed upon a tentative plan for consolidation and is now engaged in hearings throughout the United States to determine what modifications shall be made for their final plan to be adopted hereafter. This tentative plan retains the ownership of the Central Pacific by the Southern Pacific. In other words, it does not propose to destroy this system of roads as they were built up and have been operated now for approximately half a century.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is advised that the unified ownership and operation of the Central Pacific and Southern Pacific lines is in no way prejudicial to the public interest. It is advised that, on the contrary, unified ownership and operation of the two properties makes largely in favor of the public interest. This is also the determination of the California railroad commission, which, of course, has more immediate knowledge of California conditions and is more directly charged with the maintenance of California interests. There can be no question as to where the interest of the California public lies. It is plainly in retaining the complementary relation between the Central Pacific and the Southern Pacific lines; and this being plainly so, surprise here is universal that the Supreme Court has found warrant in law for tearing asunder a system whose unity has become a fixed and essential fact of long standing. It is further surprising in view of the fact that not a single witness appeared in this case before the Federal court asking that these lines should be separated. There would be consternation in California but for the circumstance that there remains in the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission possibility of correcting what in a practical sense amounts to a colossal economic error.

Presumption is one thing, fact another. The court has found that the Southern Pacific and the Central Pacific are competing lines, or would be competing lines were they not combined in one system. The law presumes that the interest of the public is in such competition, and the decision attempts to enforce it. The fact is that such competition is of no value to the public whatever; but what is of value, and has been of value incalculable in developing the transportation system of California and Oregon, is the coöperation of these lines. Some way must be found to preserve that.

A Man or a Mouse?

It is for the Board of Regents to determine if in the presidency at Berkeley there shall be a man or a mouse. The country is full of educated mice. Without stepping off the Berkeley campus there may be found a dozen men any one of whom would accept the presidency under any conditions that might be imposed or implied. And any one of them would have a certain sort of qualification; he could wear a high hat and a tail coat with a fairly simulated dignity and he could upon occasion deliver a rhetorical address upon some phase of the good, the true, and the beautiful. But under a man of such temper, whatever is wrong in the practice at Berkeley would be permitted to run along without restraint. However some regents might scheme, however others might shirk, however members of the academic senate might squabble, however they might unitedly nag and pin-prick the president, nothing would ever be heard of it. There would be the peace of supine concession, of toleration of abuses, of expanding extravagances. What is needed at Berkeley is, not a mouse, but a man—a man who will require as the first condition of his service authority to govern with a strong hand. He will insist upon power to enforce such measures of discipline as may be necessary to develop unity of purpose and all around coöperation. If he shall find in the faculty or anywhere about the establishment chronic trouble-makers, he must have authority to silence or dismiss them. In brief, he will be in effect as in name the executive head of the institution.

A mouse at Berkeley will let things slide. A man will do many things in their way revolutionary. He will put a stop to the everlasting warfare on the part of an element in the faculty against the executive administration. He will find a way to create an academic atmosphere as distinct from a condition which makes of the campus—and the region about it—something of a country club and of the classroom a Chautauqua circle. He will so curb student activities as to subordinate them to the legitimate work of the university. He will dispel the notion that numbers rather than quality is the end to be aimed at. He will so stiffen examination as to cast out the loafers and the otherwise unfit. He will make new standards of order and form to the end that the mark of a college student shall not be vulgarity in appearance and hoodlumism in conduct. To do all this—with much else that the situation demands—calls for a strong hand. No other than a strong man can do it.

The first requirement, if confusion is to be dethroned and if sanity is to be brought to the administration of Berkeley, is the installation in the president's chair of a qualified man backed at all points by the Board of Regents. If the board—the fountain of authority—is not willing to install and support a strong executive, then it will be useless to attempt anything in the way of reorganization. The responsibility is with the regents. It is to them that the public which generously sustains this school looks for something better in organization and administration than we have recently witnessed.

Dr. Barrows is retiring from the presidency because he is not willing to play the part of a mouse and because under existing conditions he finds it impossible to play the part of a man. He has said nothing to this effect, but the situation speaks for itself. In retiring he does what any self-respecting man would do under the circumstances. Not being able to conduct his office in the way it should be done, he prefers to go back to the strictly professional work of a teacher. His retirement is a confession of failure; but it is a failure for which he has no responsibility. Its causes lie in a state of things which neither he nor any man, unsupported by the Board of Regents, can change.

As we have already said, if the regents want a mouse in the president's chair at Berkeley, they can easily find one. But if they want a man—and assuredly the public which pays the bills wants a man—they will have first to set up a new order of things. They have got to find a scholar and a man of independent mind, one who knows what the deficiencies of the university are and who has the will and the power to meet and to exorcise them; and they have got to yield to him a definite grant of authority. In brief, they have got to find a man much like Dr. Barrows. No qualified man will accept the place under the conditions that have brought about Dr. Barrows' retirement. The issue, therefore, resolves itself into this question: Do the regents want in the presidency of Berkeley a man or a mouse? The Argonaut votes for a man, and it knows where one may be found. He is vacationing somewhere in the Sierra and his name is David P. Barrows.

Obstruction in the Senate.

Speaking a few days ago of the labored effort on the part of Senator Caraway of Arkansas and others on the Democratic side of the Senate to smirch Attorney-General Daugherty, Senator Moses of New Hampshire put the case in a nutshell. "This performance," he said, "is gotten up in order to furnish a smoke screen to hide the misdemeanors of Cabinet officers who served under the late Administration." Moses' reference is to former Attorney-General A. Mitchell Palmer and former Secretary of the Treasury William C. McAdoo. It is notorious that present investigations of the Department of Justice into the frauds of war administration are expected to implicate both McAdoo and Palmer. Subsequent to his resignation from the Cabinet, McAdoo became an attorney for Charles W. Morse in the latter's dealings with the Shipping Board in relation to certain contracts held by Morse for the construction of ships. The belief exists that Morse originally obtained these contracts through McAdoo's influence. Two shipping companies under Morse's control were involved financially after the war closed and he (Morse) sought cash advances from the Shipping Board on these contracts. The Shipping Board refused the advances. Then McAdoo, as counsel for Morse, appeared before the board and induced it to reverse its action and to advance sums said to aggregate approximately sixteen million dollars. These transactions with the Shipping Board are the basis for indictments which the government has now secured against Morse and against Martin J. Gillen of his counsel, who at the time was assistant to the chairman of the Shipping Board. The indictments got close to McAdoo, but stopped just short of involving him directly. No chart is needed to exhibit the purpose of the attempt to involve Daugherty, the Attorney-General of the United States, and chief prosecutor, in these cases at a time when it is possible that criminal prosecution will involve McAdoo as a party in Morse's affairs.

Palmer fits into the situation because of his relationship with the Bosch Magneto case. When Palmer was alien property custodian he seized the property of the Bosch Magneto Company on the claim that it was German-owned. It is now pleaded that in fact the property was not German-owned. However this may be, Palmer and his assistant, Francis J. Garvin, now president of the American Bosch Magneto Company, proceeded to sell the property to one Martin Kern of Pennsylvania, a political and personal associate of Palmer and Garvin. Certain newspapers recently have charged, and have not been called to account therefor, that Kern actually is and was at the time of the transaction a German citizen and an ex-convict. The sale price was about four million dollars, although the inventory books and statement of current earnings showed a value in excess of seven million dollars. The purchasers reorganized the concern, and following the retirement of Garvin from the position of alien property custodian he became its head. It now appears that Felder, who was associated with Daugherty in obtaining the pardon of Morse in 1911, has now become counsel for the original Bosch Magneto Company in its efforts to secure restitution of its property. The Bosch Magneto case has recently been brought to the attention of a United States grand jury, and there exists the possibility that both Palmer and Garvin eventually will be indicted.

There is still another sinister phase of this business, one curiously remote from any direct connection with the matters just presented. Little progress is being made in tariff legislation—and there is reason why. While the Republican senators by agreement have almost entirely eliminated speech-making on their side of the chamber and are trying seriously to get through with the tariff bill, individual Democratic senators are trying to delay action by dragging in extraneous subjects. The purpose is the mean one of emphasizing before the country the inability of the Republican majority to function efficiently or speedily. Disclaiming any intention to filibuster, they have none the less carried on a species of filibustering to a point where the delay of tariff legislation has become a scandal. One means by which confusion and delay have been promoted is this assault upon Daugherty. It has, of course, no relationship to the pending tariff legislation, and it has been lugged in for the purpose of promoting delay and preventing the carrying out of the Republican legislative programme. Thus Senator Caraway of Arkansas, chief assailant of Daugherty, is contriving to hold public attention and to obstruct legitimate work in the Senate. Questions about the propriety of Mr. Daugherty's professional record have no legitimate place in the Senate at this time, when America needs so direfully the stabilization that can come only through ending the uncertainty regarding tariff regulations and the enactment of other parts of the legislative programme needed to restore normal conditions.

Community Drama.

The Mountain Play, which was given its tenth annual presentation on Mt. Tamalpais last week, bids fair to become a local institution as famous, no doubt in a few years, as the Passion Play of Oberammergau. True, the Tamalpais production is not a religious manifestation, but it is just as genuine an outgrowth of the people. It is true community drama. San Francisco has one more feather in her civic cap in her position as chief sponsor of the Mountain Play. Other localities have annual pageants, and the annual May ceremony on Tamalpais is reducible to a pageant, but there is a difference—probably the fact already referred to that the Mountain Play, like the three-century-old institution of Oberammergau, is not a factitious expression of art. It is the inevitable expression of the love of out-doors. The Mountain Play should grow a slow natural growth, as it undoubtedly will if left to the instincts of the community. The worst thing that could happen to it, and a thing that in our over-efficient country is likely to happen to it, would be to fall into the managing hands of some Belasco who would double or treble its profits and commercialize its talents. For the present, the production of the Mountain Play must remain in skilled hands. It has come a century or so too late to be a spontaneous folk ceremony. But the spirit is there. It need not be inculcated or even cherished. It need only be let alone. It should be possible for California to produce a school of mountain players. We need not slavishly imitate the pageant of Oberammergau and relegate rôles to hereditary rights. Imitation of anything, even of the most venerable of folk plays, should be barred. But a school of community players who would perform the Mountain Play fittingly and keep it free from commercialization and from the professional tactics of the American stage ought to be a natural ambition for every devotee of the Tamalpais pageant.

The Galahad Group and the Constitution.

It is to be feared that the Supreme Court has depopularized itself once more with a certain class of reformer by two recent decisions: one on the child labor law of 1919, which sought to tax an abuse to death; and the other on the grain futures act, which sought to tax to death something many persons regard as an abuse. Both decisions are based on the fundamental American principle of state rights, vital to our national welfare, but of small account to warm-hearted champions of the oppressed when doing doughty battle with the oppressor.

A country needs both reformers and statesmen. Reformers have good hearts, and statesmen are supposed to have good heads. The persons with good hearts rarely stop to consider that the secondary effects of a reform may be far more important than the primary object, or destructive of things more vital to humanity than those the reformers wish to conserve. They demand immediate cure for whatever ails us at the moment, or whatever they happen to be thinking about that day, no matter what the effect may be upon our institutions or the bed plates of government. It then becomes the function of statesmen, and in this instance judges of the Supreme Bench, to oppose, as gently as may be, the warm enthusiasms and humane desires of those whose hearts are good. Whereupon those whose hearts are good almost invariably denounce their opponents as persons whose hearts are bad—when it is merely that their heads are cool, and their judgment is in fair working order.

A good example of warm-hearted reformer is Senator La Follette. He belongs in the class of those whose hearts are consciously pure. He might, in fact, be classified as one of the Galahad Group. And while we may concede innocence to that group, and sanctity, and holiness of purpose, it would never do to rely either upon ignorance or stupidity as one of its attributes. Long ago Senator La Follette discovered that the Federal power to tax might be used to destroy; and destruction being in line with reform, we may suppose that he passed a night of purification and dedication, lying we may also suppose in forma crucis before the altar, arose with the dawn, drank a cup of pure, cold water for breakfast, had his shining armor buckled on by his faithful squire, mounted his Milwaukee war-horse, loosened his snickersnee in its sheath, laid his lance in rest according to the most approved Galahads of old, and set out to destroy—oleomargarine. By some rare coincidence, oleomargarine was the national evil and immoral food at that time afflicting, competitively, the dairying interests of Wisconsin, another pure-hearted class. If some persons regarded oleomargarine as perfectly good food, and wanted it to eat, that merely proved that their appetites were carnal and their hearts impure. Oleomargarine was made from the fat of slaughtered animals, and it competed with fat extracted from milk. So it was discovered to be a terrible national evil which must be destroyed—exactly as Carthage was an evil to the commercial Romans of Cato's day.

It must be, of a certainty, mere accident that the Galahad Group is so often aligned with the Silver-smiths of Ephesus: and also with the Barbers of Oroville, whose sanitary zeal, inflamed by the recent beard-growing contest at Sacramento, we have had occasion to celebrate in these columns. Nevertheless it is strange how often the passion for destructive reform selects for its object some practice or commodity that competes with the commercial interests of the reformer's constituents; strange, for example, how a child-labor law would protect New England mills against Southern competition. Yes, it must be mere coincidence; and we wish merely to call attention to the secondary effect of such reforms. When food went short during the war, and everybody scraped his plate, and old ladies planted potato parings, and every ounce was needed to win and help our associate nations win, and the cost of living mounted and mounted, this great reform, the tax on oleomargarine, was operating to increase living costs and shorten the supply of one great article of food. Artificial interferences with people's private business, and with their local affairs, may be trusted to work just that way. We might multiply examples of reforming zeal that happens also to be profitable to a reformer's constituency, but one is enough.

Against this power to destroy by taxation, and against taxation for the purpose of destruction, whether as a sanctified shining sword of the Galahad Group, or the base weapon of the wicked fighting for their own hand, the Supreme Court and Chief Justice Taft have at last, in the child-labor decision, set their faces. In effect they declare that such use of the taxing power is a mere mask to cover the real object, and refuse to permit the taxing clause of the Constitution to be converted into a police regulation and hence an invasion of the rights of the states. And the opinion contains this cool-headed pronouncement:

The good sought in unconstitutional legislation is an insidious feature, because it leads citizens and legislators of good purpose to promote it without thought of the serious breach it will make in the ark of our covenant, or the harm which will come from breaking down recognized standards. In the maintenance of local self-government on the one hand and the national power on the other our country has been able to endure and prosper for nearly a century and a half.

Such a statement as that is strangely lacking in the ardor and exaltation of statutory reform. There is nothing to it but common sense. It does not show whether the Supreme Court has a pure heart or not. Emotion is well known to be essential to purity, but there is nothing emotional in it. It might have been pronounced by a mere banker, or manufacturer, or stationer, or lawyer, or judge, or—or anybody. It is to be doubted whether men so cold and calculating could be trusted to break down archaic laws that only tend to restrain the passion of reform, and to help us engage in jacking up humanity to the serene altitudes of Soviet control or some such socialization of industry as California's proposed Water and Power Amendment. No. The Supreme Court, by this decision, has distinctly placed itself in the category of those almost mercenary persons who, in times of fanatic hysteria, coldly point out the fact that it is not always wisdom to burn down the barn in order to get rid of the rats. For that, we suppose it is in for another Bryanesque attack on its integrity and its purity; some crown-of-thorns-and-cross-of-gold pronouncement that will show that the pronouncer's heart is in the right place, by contrast with the Supreme Court's heart, which is not.

And, worse and more of it, the court has invited such strictures even more pressingly by its decision on the grain futures act. Trading in grain futures was an iniquity of the first rank, and a thing for the embattled Galahads to charge upon with every red tongue waving in the breeze. Section 4 of the act sought to impose a tax of 20 cents a bushel on future trades in grain on exchanges not designated as contract markets subject to Federal control; or when not made by actual owners, or the renters of land on which the grain was to be grown. The court's opinion distinctly holds that this would be an invasion of the police powers of the states, an effort to regulate, by the taxation subterfuge, transactions over which the Federal government has no constitutional authority.

The Galahad Group will probably damn both these decisions as "reactionary." But it will do no harm, if the country can remain sufficiently calm to understand that the reaction is back toward those fundamental principles on which the government was founded and from which the unrestrained ardor of the persons whose hearts were good but whose heads were addled by reformatory fevers endeavored to pervert it.

Our forefathers sought deliverance from a centralized autocracy. They had fought a long war to escape that of England's German king, George III. They saw safety in dividing powers among the local political units, keeping the weight of authority in the states. Moreover, the states were jealous of distant control, and well they might be still. At the same time the founders of the republic provided that the states should not in effect disrupt their union, so hardly formed, by building up local barriers against one another's commerce. We have today, as a result, an interstate trade which is probably as great as the international trade of all Europe (some authorities say greater than that), and it has made the nation strong. We have needed no Genoa economic conference here to say what goods and how much shall flow from Connecticut to Kansas, or from Lowell to San Francisco. Throughout the United States you can send where you please for what you need, and get it free of local obstruction. If every state were ringed by a commercial barrier against every other, Nevada would have to manufacture its own hides into boots, instead of having them made at Brockton or at Napa, and they would be produced under such disadvantageous conditions and for such a narrow market they would probably cost fifty dollars a pair. Instead of one civil war over the Union itself, we might have had a dozen by this time over commercial interferences, and the Union would have become a thing of long past history. But such conditions as we enjoy depend on the settled relations of the states and the Federal government, settled by the making of the Constitution in 1787. The experiences of the nation and the stages of its growth have but confirmed the wisdom of the founders. There were giants in those days. Now we have zealots who would destroy the rights of the states and tax some hated article of interstate commerce out of existence to satisfy a transient need that could be served some other way. We have Johnson, La Follette, Borah and France; men looking at the little, pressing things, and forgetting the larger and more vital interests of a great people. Fortunately there is many a check upon the Galahad Group embodied in the Constitution itself. It was well put together. Let us not, for some temporary benefit, throw it on the junk pile—at least, not until the Shriners have come and gone.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Word of Approval.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 27, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I congratulate you on your editorial on the Berkeley University. It tells the whole story fundamentally. Many good farmer boys are being spoiled in the effort to make of them "biled shirt" operatives. C. M. W.

Berkeley and Palo Alto.

SACRAMENTO, May 27, 1922.

MY DEAR HOLMAN: Seeking seclusion today from the '49 celebration, I came to the club and read the issue of date 27th instant.

I want to assure you that your editorial comment on "U. C." is an impressive arraignment of a dead wrong policy. If the whole thing is not changed very soon that institution will be as unlike a university as a market place is unlike an art gallery.

My heart bounds when I see how they are striving for high quality at Palo Alto. A man must have outstanding qualities to get in, and he must use his time to good advantage to stay in. Stanford is trying to standardize its output. It wants quality and cares nothing for quantity. L. H.

The recent bicentenary celebration of the introduction of umbrellas into England served as a reminder, not only of the fact that the umbrella was not of English origin—though its universal use there is proverbial—but also of its extreme antiquity. In "The Birds," a play written in 414 B. C., during the siege of Syracuse by Alcibiades and Nisias, in which the Athenians' fondness for litigation and their flighty character are ridiculed, Aristophanes reveals the true inventor of the "umbrella," or sunshade, and, therefore, of the umbrella, its enlargement. The inventor was none other than Prometheus. He invented the umbrella to conceal himself from Jupiter, his enemy, and he said of it: "I shall look like a canephore" (basket-bearer, one of the Athenian maidens selected to carry the baskets of sacred utensils in the procession of Demeter, Bacchus, and Athene).

The question whether to invite German artists to participate in the international exhibition of decorative arts to be held in 1924 is still a vital and stormy issue in France. Critics, artists, and artisans have been asked to give their opinion in the press, and responses have begun to come in. Georges Lecomte was one of the first to register disapproval and declare himself strongly against inviting the Germans, giving as his reason the fact that Germany has not disarmed and remains a peril to Europe, and should therefore be kept under the ban by the other nations.

The new Egyptian flag is a white crescent and three white stars on a green ground.

NEW YORK LETTER.

Sidewalk Notaries, Guards for Marshal French. Markham Defends Poe, and Mack Denies He Is Supporting Hearst.

One of the curious industries of Gotham these spring days is that of the sidewalk notary who swears you to your application for an automobile license. (Come to the rush for licenses, and the long sidewalk queue that form in Sixty-Fifth Street near the automobile bureau's headquarters, this fraternity has found good picking among those too impatient to wait until their part of the line reaches the offices of the bureau, where they could get all this notarial service free. Application blanks are free, also, but to many a weary and flat-footed applicant time is not, and any of it that can be saved is worth what it costs. Hence $2 each is not regarded as too much to pay for a blank that can be had inside for nothing; if you can get inside. The business seems perfectly legitimate, and the service just as valuable as that of the green grocer who saves you the time it would take to go out on Long Island or into New Jersey and dicker with the farmer for the beans, carrots, egg-plant and Welsh onions you may want. And it is not compulsory to patronize these gentlemen if you wish to wait. Sometimes the queue has been five blocks long. Nevertheless the sidewalk notaries are not supposed to overcharge, no matter how valuable they may be to you, or how much of your time they may have saved, and so from time to time some of their number are arrested. They have formed a combination and hired legal talent for their defense, and as often as they are marched off to a magistrate they are discharged for lack of evidence. The business rests on the sure foundation of a public want, and appears to be growing.

The sidewalk notaries are the reverse, or dorsal, aspect of the general outdoor sport of being examined for a license. By the first of July the applicants examined will number more than 90,000 for the year. There are 135,000 operators' licenses out, that is for private drivers, and 134,000 for chauffeurs, which includes truck drivers, taxicab operators, and private chauffeurs. The fees come in at the rate of $14,000 a day. So it is evident that a number of persons are interested in getting licenses and in the obstacles to be cleared. Skill in handling a car is a prerequisite, and is only to be ascertained by examination. And it is no paper examination where you sit at a table and answer questions—you have to take an examiner out for a ride and show him. The wretched Missourian sits on the seat beside you and gives you the glassy eye while you show him and show him and show him. And like a child whom you are showing off to company, your car balks, and backfires, and sticks and goes dead and refuses to answer the wheel, and he sits there and looks and looks, until you feel that you couldn't drive the old cow home from the pasture lot. He makes unreasonable requests—that is, they feel unreasonable at the time. He wants you to stop on hills, although you have no desire to do it and no reason for doing it. He may, as like as not, ask you to park between two other cars parked at the curb, and of course you forget to run past and back in, and can't get within two feet of it to save your life. You may be in a procession of other victims of this modern mechanical inquisition, and then if you do anything wrong you will tangle up the whole line, and at the same time you are subject to the risk of having some one else do something wrong and throw out all your calculations. It is a heart disease experience, but no one that wishes to drive can escape. Women who have always taken the safe method of running around the square when they wished to turn around may be required to make a switchback in the middle of the block. You are not asked to take any hurdles or do any rough stunts, but it all seems rough when the examiner sits beside you and rides without a word of encouragement. There is one thing that can be said for them, though—they are brave men.

House rents affect more people than automobile licenses, and recently they have taken a turn for the better. This is not due to the anti-rent-profiteering statutes, but to the slow and sure operation of economic law. Two years ago many of the landlords felt that they had the game in their own hands, and no matter what courts and the legislature might seek to do for the relief of tenants they would have to pay what the owners asked. Neither landlords nor legislators appeared to understand that they were in the grip of something mightier than either, and that rents would take a course independent of both. Very little extra building has been done, thanks to those anti-landlord laws, whose operation was merely to confirm the monopoly of those who owned housing. But in spite of that fact, rents are lower, and may decline still farther. They had been set at figures the people simply could not pay, and so, without much real competition, they must descend. In fixing prices, regard must be paid the ability of the possible customer. As a matter of work-out, rather than theory, the effective demand consists, not of all those who wish a thing, but only of those who both wish it and can buy it. At the old extortionate rents of two years and a year ago, the effective demand was far less than it seemed. If rents were to remain so high, people would stay in smaller quarters, remain doubled up with relatives, two and four families in accommodations built for one; and leave some of the high-rent apartment houses unoccupied. The owners of such property are beginning to see a new light. Not generosity, and not rent fixing by statute has brought lowered rents, but necessity of another sort. And there are many persons who think it would have been better to leave it to economic law in the first place. They say there would have been more housing than there is now and hence more accommodation for all, for the present supply is still narrowly limited.

It is considered by many a curious thing that a guard of sixty policemen was thought necessary to protect Field Marshal Earl French of Ypres from annoyance during his address the other day at the unveiling of five portrait busts in the Hall of Fame, the open colonnade of New York University, overlooking the Harlem. Such a precaution might be deemed excessive, and the sign of an over-anxious interpretation of sentiment, were it not for the fact that Earl French's automobile, which is decorated with small and modest British flags, has been greeted in various parts of the city lately with most unfriendly hoots and jeers and other expression of animosity. These things have not disturbed the serenity of the great British soldier, but they have given some apprehension to those responsible for his entertainment and safety. Hence the guard at the exercises. One of the busts unveiled was that of Washington, a copy from the full-length figure by Houdon in the capital at Richmond, Virginia. It was the gift of New York City Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, and was formally presented by the chapter's regent, Mrs. Alfred W. Cochrane. Standing before this portrait, Earl French said in part:

We claim that this great American is also English and he conferred equal benefits upon us which have culminated in that close unity which now prevails between the Anglo-Saxon-speaking races on both sides of the Atlantic.

When Dr. Johnson first asked me to speak at the unveiling of the bust of Washington I appreciated the honor, but wondered why you selected a British soldier. Now I understand. This day will ever remain in my memory as a touching compliment in which the citizens of this country show to me how strong is the friendship of the great English-speaking people. I say friendship, but it is far more. Political policies may come and political policies may go, but I am convinced that the friendship of the English-speaking peoples will ever be strong.

The other busts unveiled were those of Edgar Allen Poe, Mark Hopkins, Gilbert Charles Stuart and Maria Mitchell. This makes eight in the colonnade, the others being those of Robert Fulton, General Grant, and Horace Mann. During the ceremonies your former fellow-Californian, Edwin Markham, author of "The Man with the Hoe," seized the opportunity to bring the fame of his fellow-poet, Poe, more into line with the Volstead Act than it has been heretofore. He unveiled the Poe bust, but soft-pedaled the Poe busts. He said that Poe was not a drunkard at all in the ordinary and proper sense of the word, but left his audience wondering what the proper sense of the word drunkard might be. As Congress seems to have the power to define intoxicating liquors, it might try its hand at defining drunkard; the one being so closely related to the other.

Another former Californian appears to be having some difficulty constructing his fame just as he would like to have it. Norman E. Mack of Buffalo, one of the big Democratic bosses of up-state politics, commissioner-general of New York to your Panama-Pacific Exposition in 1915, denies that he will support the aspirations of William Randolph Hearst for the Democratic nomination for governor. The contrary story had previously come to Manhattan and had caused much rejoicing in the Hearst camp, for Mack is a power in the city by the big falls; and the denial caused corresponding depression. It is said that Mack is for former governor Alfred E. Smith, now in the trucking business, and he is not alone. He never is, for long at a time. His denial, however, gives little hope to any aspirant, for it not only declares for none, but says he does not intend to make any statement of any sort on candidates for senator or governor. The Hearst forces have fallen down in their effort to get "Al" Smith on their side, and their main hope now is to get into synopated harmony with former governor Martin H. Glynn by running him for United States senator. Glynn is not supposed to be very strong. When he ran for a second term as governor he lost even his own county of Albany. Both Glynn and Hearst have gone abroad, and may meet on the other side of the water to arrange politics on this side.

STUYVESANT.
NEW YORK, May 26, 1922.

On the sea coast near Germany's former submarine base at Kiel there has recently been unveiled a unique memorial to the murderous U-boats which nearly won the war for the Hun. A model of the German submarine No. 291 is mounted above a copy of one of the North Sea mines that sunk it—truly a ghastly shrine.

Another prohibition amendment needed is one to prohibit some people from fussing about other people's dissipation.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Colonel Isaac R. Sherwood, who has for many years been a member of the House from Ohio, is still a candidate for Congress at eighty-seven.

Little Marie Louise Bobb of New Orleans has won first prize in sixteen "perfect baby" contests. Her title as champion "perfect baby" of the South is practically undisputed.

Sarola Devi, a niece of Rabindranath Tagore, is an ardent Indian feminist. Her Brahman friends will not take food under her roof because she has lost caste by her democratic habits and doctrines.

Mrs. Louis N. Geldert, better known as Grace Duffie Boylan, has been recently elected national president of the League of American Pen Women. Mrs. Geldert began her writing career on a Chicago newspaper in 1893.

Basil Miles, who served as secretary to the American delegation at the Arms Conference, has been appointed American administrative commissioner at headquarters of the International Chamber of Commerce at Paris.

Miss Jean Kennedy, a junior of Mount Holyoke College, has been selected as the delegate from twenty-one women's colleges of the United States to represent them at the World Christian Student Conference at Peking, China, the first of its kind ever held.

Corporal Claude Samosnoff is the youngest hero of the Russian revolution on record. This nine-year-old scout for his father's Cossack troops in the guerrilla warfare against the Bolsheviks has been wounded three times and decorated with the Cross of St. George. The youthful hero is now in a Russian orphanage at Cannes, France, following his father's death.

Francis White of Baltimore, until recently first secretary of the American Embassy at Buenos Aires, has been appointed chief of the division of Latin-American affairs in the State Department. He will assume office on June 5. Mr. White, who succeeds Sumner Wells, is only thirty years old and has been in the diplomatic service since 1915. His first post was at Peking.

Mrs. Molla Bjurstedt Mallory, tennis champion, has the modern gift of versatility. She is an ardent horticulturist and a clever draughtsman. Mrs. Mallory recently sketched bits of the gardens of the White House and intends to emulate the White House tennis plots, where the courts are screened by tall bushes. The tennis champion has recently sat for a portrait bust by the noted pianist, composer, and sculptor, Christian Schiottz.

The Most Reverend Bonaventura Cerretti, papal nuncio at Paris, who has been appointed secretary of state to the new Pope, Pius XI, has spent a large part of his life in America, where he was auditor of the apostolic delegation at Washington. From Washington, Archbishop Cerretti was sent as papal delegate to the Catholic church in Australia, where he lived for nearly four years in Melbourne. During his Washington residence Mgr. Cerretti was a prominent social figure, as he was possessed of great urbanity and a gift of many languages.

Roland Hayes, the American negro tenor, has been given an enthusiastic welcome in London musical circles. Hayes, who was born thirty-five years ago in Curryville, Georgia, studied for eight years under Arthur J. Hubbard of Boston. His first appearance was in 1911 and since then he has sung all over the world. He sings in every European language, but confesses to a preference for dark melodies. He knows fifteen operas and an equal number of oratorios. The negro singer regards his work primarily as a missionary effort for his people and himself as their torch-bearer.

Gifford Pinchot, Republican candidate for governor of Pennsylvania, was born in Simsbury, Connecticut, in 1865, and his life has been devoted to the conservation of forests. He took his A. B. at Yale in 1889, his master's degree in 1901, and an honorary master's at Princeton in 1904. He has several other degrees culled from McGill, and Michigan Agricultural College, all for excelling in the science of forestry. He has studied forestry in France, Germany, Switzerland and Austria. He began the first systematic conservation work in the United States at Biltmore, North Carolina, in 1892, and was one of the leaders in the development of the conservation policy of the Roosevelt administration. He has been president of the National Conservation Association since January, 1910, and professor of forestry at Yale since 1903. Mr. Pinchot is author of "The Adirondack Spruce," "A Primer of Forestry," and "The Fight for Conservation."

A graphic description of Germany's great industrial magnate, Hugo Stinnes, is contributed by a correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung: "He has the appearance of a worker and could go about in the clothes of a foreman or a miner without attracting attention. His thick head is set upon a stocky trunk; his black hair is cut close; the face is pale and expansive; the beard is black as coal; the nose is curved, and the eyes are heavily underlined. His external appearance is devoid of pose; he seems heavy and solid. Clothes, habits, and bearing denote a man of simple tastes." Stinnes' influence is widely known, but the extent of it is only properly realized in Germany, where it is said to be impossible to spend a day without paying tribute to one of his enterprises—newspaper, hotel, factory, mill, coal mine or steamship company. After the armistice in 1918, Stinnes began to attract attention by buying newspapers, not only in Germany, but also in Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary. He is said to be the owner of the weeklies, Simplicissimus and Jugend. Maximilian Harden wrote of Stinnes, "Never have such power, capital, boldness and enterprise been concentrated in one German. To the socialist he is a Satan who desires to 'Stinnesize' the whole nation; to the Pan-German he is a Messiah, sent to avenge and save Germany."

OLD FAVORITES.

My New Year's Guests.

(Midnight, December 31, 1881, in Virginia City. On the wall photographs of five hundred California pioneers.)

The winds come cold from the Southward, with incense of fir and pine,
And the flying clouds grow darker as they halt and fall in line.
The valleys that reach the deserts, the mountains that greet the clouds, Lie bare in the arms of Winter, which the gathering night enshrouds.
The leafless sage on the hillside, the willows low down the stream,
And the sentry rocks above us have faded all as a dream.
And the fall of the stamp grows fainter, the voices of night sing low,
And spelled from labor the miner toils through the drifting snow.
As I sit alone in my chamber, this last of the dying year,
Dim shades of the past surround me, and faint through the storm I hear
Old tales of the castles builded under shelving rock and pine,
Of the bearded men and stalwart, I greeted in 'forty-nine:
The giants with hopes audacious, the giants with iron limb,
The giants who journeyed Westward, when the trails were new and dim:
The giants who felled the forests, made pathways over the snows,
And planted the vine and fig-tree where the manzanita grows;
Who swept down the mountain gorges, and painted the endless night
With their cabins rudely fashioned, and their camp fires' ruddy light;
Who builded great towns and cities, who swung back the Golden Gate,
And hewed from a mighty ashlar the form of a sovereign state;
Who came like a flood of waters to a thirsty desert plain
And where there had been no reapers grew valleys of golden grain.
Nor wonder that this strange music sweeps in from the silent past,
And comes with the storm this evening and blends into strains with the blast:
Nor wonder that through the darkness should enter a spectral throng,
And gather around my table with the old-time smile and song;
For there on the wall before me, in a frame of gilt and brown,
With a chain of years suspended, old faces are looking down;
Five hundred all grouped together—five hundred old Pioneers—
Now list as I raise the taper and trace the steps of the years;
Behold this face near the centre; we met ere his locks were gray.
His purse like his heart was open; he struggles for bread today.
To this one the fates were cruel, but he bore his burden well,
And the willow bends in sorrow by the wayside where he fell.
Great losses and grief crazed this one; great riches turned this one's head;
And a faithless wife wrecked this one—he lives but were better dead.
Now closer the light on this face; 'twas wrinkled when we were young:
His touch drew our footsteps Westward, his name was on every tongue.
Rich was he in land and kindness, but the human deluge came,
And left him at last with nothing, but death and deathless fame.
For years have I watched these shadows, as others I know have done,
As death touched their lips with silence, I have draped them one by one,
Till, seen where the dark-plumed angel has mingled here and there,
The brows I have flecked with sable cloud, the living everywhere.
Darker and darker and darker these shadows will yearly grow
As changing the seasons bring us the bud and the falling snow;
And soon—let me not invoke it!—the final prayer will be said,
And strangers will write the record, "the last of the group is dead."
And then—why stand here gazing? A gathering storm in my eyes
Is mocking the weeping tempest that billows the midnight skies;
And, stranger still, is it fancy?—Are my senses dazed and weak?
The shadowy lips are moving as if they would ope and speak.
And I seem to hear low whispers, and catch the echo of strains
That rose from the golden gulches, and followed the moving trains.
The scent of the sage and desert, the path on the rocky height,
The shallow graves by the roadside, all, all have come back tonight;
And the midwived years, like stubble, I trample under my feet;
And drink again at the fountain when the wine of life was sweet;
And I stand once more exalted, where the white pine frets the skies
And dream in the winding cañon where early the twilight dies.
Bar closely the curtained windows, shut the light from every pane,
While free from the worldly intrusion and curious eyes profane
I take from its leathern casket a dented old cup of tin,
More precious to me than silver, and blessing the draught within.
I drink alone and in silence to the "Builders of the West!"
"Long life to the hearts still beating, and peace to the hearts at rest!"

HARRIMAN AND THE WEST.

A Great Railroad Executive's Services to Illinois, San Francisco, and the Imperial Valley.

The masses of the people are almost doomed to misunderstand a man like E. H. Harriman, because they lack information about him. Five centuries before Christ an old Chinaman said: "The people can be made to follow; they can not be made to understand." It is a popular preachment, for example, that the rich are wicked. We reason that if we had been in Harriman's place when the decision was made to advance Union Pacific's dividend to 10 per cent. we should have withheld the news until we had loaded up with Union Pacific, and therefore Harriman must have done so. But according to George Kennan's biography of him, the fact is nothing of the sort. He had been buying Union Pacific for eight or nine years in anticipation of that dividend, which he felt confident he would some day make the road earn. The news was merely delayed out of courtesy to two absent directors, and until the stock exchange could open in New York; instead of throwing the trades to London. Harriman had created his profits, and profits for thousands of stockholders and a vast area of the country, long before the dividend was advanced.

A good deal the same thing is true of the business in "Chicago & Alton," once the subject of investigation and scandal. But Kennan's biography points to what was really of public importance when it says:

By his "dealings" in the Chicago & Alton he almost entirely rebuilt the road; doubled its passenger accommodations; improved immensely its train service; increased by 134 per cent. the hauling power of its locomotives; added 269 per cent. to its capacity for moving freight; fostered old industries and created new ones all along its line, and enabled the people of Illinois to "create" tens of millions of dollars which they never could have created without the traffic facilities given them by Mr. Harriman's betterments. If the Interstate Commerce Commissioners could show anything like this equivalent for the money they have "transferred" from the United States treasury to themselves, their claim to have earned their salaries would be unquestioned and unquestionable.

The real Harriman, the transportation genius, the actuating motive of tremendous forces, is probably explained in this bit from an unpublished statement by the man himself:

It is impossible for a railroad company to sever its interests from those of its patrons. Its life blood is drawn from their prosperity, and it must furnish them with adequate and ever-increasing facilities at reasonable rates, wholly irrespective of its capitalization. If the calculations of the organizers of a railroad company turn out to be erroneous, and the capitalization is fixed at too high a figure, it is a misfortune for them and the other security-holders; but the widespread popular impression that a railroad company can extort money from the public at will, and in defiance of the laws of trade, simply for the purpose of paying interest or dividends upon increased issues of securities, is not justified by the facts.

Enough, however, of apologetics; to which, if it has a fault, a little too much of Mr. Kennan's book is devoted. We have to deal with a moving picture of more thrilling realities than those they simulate at Hollywood. Harriman not only rebuilt the key transportation system of the West, and the greatest transportation system in the world, with all that means for the West and the nation, but this former Wall Street broker with his clear perceptions of human needs came to California and here grappled with two of the mighty forces of old Chaos itself: the San Francisco earthquake and fire, and the runaway Colorado River. It was magnificent drama because it was so real.

Henry Anderson Laffler has made quite plain what the people of San Francisco in their calamity owed to the government and government interference with their individual efforts—nothing, in the most charitable view of it. But E. H. Harriman was not the government. He was a great business man, not a politician—a man of the character and ability which Bryce long before observed in his "American Commonwealth" does not aspire to be the chief executive of the country, but of a railroad. The news of the earthquake reached Harriman in New York on the afternoon of April 18th, and he immediately telegraphed the officials of the Union and Southern Pacific systems to put all the resources of the roads at the service of the city. The next morning he started west on a special train, shooting telegraphic orders ahead for his managers to rush supplies, especially foodstuffs, into San Francisco. On the day of the disaster, E. E. Calvin, vice-president and general manager of the Southern Pacific, bought $20,000 worth of food in Los Angeles and Sacramento and sent it here on freight trains running on passenger schedules—and the result was that nobody had to go hungry for a single day. But the city had to be in large part evacuated to reduce the food problem, and the sanitation problem, and a hundred other problems then sprung on the world for the first time. This work was done with speed and safety, through the smooth functioning of a "soulless" corporation, directed by a "Wall Street magnate." Says Kennan:

The most urgent need, at first, was transportation for the relief supplies that California and the country at large were ready to furnish, and this need Mr. Harriman, with his two great railway systems, was abundantly able to meet. He immediately ordered operating officials throughout the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific systems to give relief trains and refugee trains right-of-way over all other traffic, and to carry both people and supplies without charge. Food, clothing, and tents, from various parts of the Pacific Coast, were already pouring into the city, and they were quickly supplemented by similar supplies from the East, where they were bought with $2,500,000 appropriated by Congress and more than $10,000,000 subscribed by the people of the United States. In the thirty-five days between April 18th and May 23d the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific railways brought into San Francisco, free of charge, 1603 carloads of supplies, at a cost of $445,410, and carried out of the city 224,069 refugees whose fares, if they had been paid, would have amounted to $500,831.

Kennan's story of the battle with the Colorado River on the rampage and threatening to fill the Salton Sink and submerge a valley as fertile as Egypt is an apparently complete and certainly a fascinating narrative. We can only sample it here, but here is a sample:

The most dangerous and alarming feature of the situation was the "cutting-back" of the torrents into which the flood-water collected as it rushed down the delta slope toward the Salton Sea. The fine silt of which the soil was composed washed out like powdered sugar, and wherever there happened to be a strong current, the flow soon produced a miniature rapid. The rapid then became a cascade, the cascade grew into a fall, and the fall finally developed into a roaring cataract, which "cut back," up-stream, at the rate sometimes of four thousand feet a day, widening as it receded, and leaving below it a deep gorge with almost perpendicular walls. Some of the gorges eroded in the light friable silt by these receding waterfalls were fifty to eighty feet deep and more than a thousand feet across. It was estimated that the channels thus formed during the floods of 1906 had an aggregate length of more than forty miles, and that the solid matter scoured out of them and carried down into the Salton Sea was nearly four times as great as the whole amount excavated in the digging of the Panama Canal. But the damage actually done by these receding waterfalls was unimportant in comparison with the damage that they threatened to do. If one of them should "cut back" far enough to break into the irrigation system of the California Development Company, all the water in the latter's canals and ditches would instantly flow down into the deep gorge below the cataract, and bring about a disaster almost unprecedented in history. The twelve thousand settlers in the desert oasis were wholly dependent upon the irrigation system for their supply of drinking water, and if that supply should be cut off, they would be compelled by thirst either to camp around the margin of the Salton Sea, which was ten or fifteen miles away from most of them, or else get out of the valley within forty-eight hours in a wild precipitate stampede. Paradoxical as it may seem, the danger of being driven out by lack of water was even greater and more immediate than the danger of being drowned out by the rising flood.

It was Harriman who insisted that the river could and must be beaten. Without his resolution, which never brooked excuses or verdicts that "it can't be done," the money could not have been found, and if it had been the effort would probably have been abandoned after the many ineffectual and discouraging trials. The operations were tremendous in range and scope, and nothing could better illustrate the power and resourcefulness of a great organization than Kennan's account of building a branch line, borrowing 300 great cars from the Lucin Cut-off job, and opening quarries hundreds of miles away to get the necessary stone. The emergency was novel; they had no precedents for such a work. Indian labor was employed, and much the Indians must have marveled at the white man's genius for getting himself into trouble. When Cheops built his celebrated little monument he had plenty of time; and General Goethals did not have to meet any particular engagements when he dug the Canal—but this work had to be done in the face of on-coming flood. The final closure has been thus described by F. H. Newell, director of the United States Reclamation Service, quoted as follows in the narrative:

The stones used were as large as could be handled or pushed from the flatcars by a gang of men, or by as many men as could get around a stone. In some cases the pieces were so large that it was necessary to break them by what are called "pop-shots" of dynamite laid upon the stone while it rested on the cars. In this way the stones were broken and then could be readily thrown overboard by hand. The scene at the closure of the break was exciting. Train after train with heavy locomotives came to the place and the stones, large and small, were pushed off by hundreds of workmen as rapidly as the cars could be placed. While waiting to get out upon the trestle the larger stones were broken by "pop-shots," and the noise sounded like artillery in action. Added to the roar of the waters were the whistle signals, the orders to the men, and the bustle of an army working day and night to keep ahead of the rapid cutting of the stream.

It was necessary to raise the river bodily by about eleven feet. As the water rose and became ponded on the upper side of the rock-heap, trainload after trainload of small stone and gravel from the near-by hills was dumped to fill the spaces between the large rocks. Finally, after days and nights of struggle, the water was raised to a point where it began to flow down its former channel and less and less to pass over the rock-heap. Then finer material was added and rapidly piled up on the accumulated rock-mass. At first, a large amount of water passed through, and steps were taken as rapidly as possible to close the openings by dumping sand and gravel, finishing this work by hydraulicking silt or mud over the area and washing this in with a hose. By thus piling up finer and finer material and distributing it, the seepage or percolation through the mass was quickly checked and the barrier became effective.

That was a job. It was not Harriman's business to do it. The interests of the Southern Pacific in the Imperial Valley were relatively slight, and its relation to the California Development Company, according to Kennan, was that of a creditor. Elwood Mead, chief of the Irrigation and Drainage Division of the Department of Agriculture, said:

It was the duty of the state or nation to take charge, and provide the money and men needed to restore the river to its former channel. Apparently no one in authority was interested; the state government only considered the matter long enough to write a letter to the President, and the President, having Congress on his hands, shifted the responsibility to the head of a railroad company; and it was not until the railroad company took charge that we have the first refreshing example of generosity and public spirit. Nothing could have been finer than the action of Mr. Harriman. The loan of $250,000, when his time and resources were overtaxed by the earthquake at San Francisco, and the providing more than $1,000,000 for the last hazardous attempt to save the valley, furnish an inspiring contrast to the supine indifference and irresponsibility shown by both the state and Federal authorities.

And in a letter on the subject Epes Randolph, who as president of the California Development Company directed the engineering operations from 1905 to 1907, testified:

It was a great work, and I do not believe that any man whom I have ever known, except Mr. Harriman, would have undertaken it. All of those of us who actually handled the work were merely instruments in the hands of the Master Builder.

Yet Harriman received no particular credit from the government whose dam he had saved, or the nation whose river he had brought under control when the government could not meet the emergency. Roosevelt, whose habit it was to call a man a bad name and then hate him for it, had quarreled with Harriman over New York politics, and could not bring himself to mention him personally in connection with this wonder-work, but referred to it as something done by the officials of the Southern Pacific Company. The cost had been about $3,000,000, and the saving about $700,000,000, if such potentialities can ever be estimated, yet Congress cut down a modest claim of $1,663,000 to $773,000, and in that shape Congressman Goldfogle, Kitchin, Candler, Shackelford and Adair called it "an attempted raid on the Federal treasury," a "gratuity," a "gift of the people's money" to private enterprise. So it was never paid. A fair measure of the values produced in the Imperial Valley would probably be $25,000,000 a year, but it is growing so fast it can not be calculated. What Harriman got out of it was "the satisfaction of knowing that we saved it."

Nor was his interest confined to material things and achievements. Witness the Harriman expedition to Alaska—a pleasure trip turned into a voyage of discovery. One of that party was John Muir—"John o' the mountains, wonderful John"—who tells this experience with him:

He spent most of the summer of 1907 at his Pelican Bay Lodge on Klamath Lake, in southern Oregon. On his arrival in San Francisco he said to me:

"You're going to the Lodge with us, are you not?"

"Yes," I replied, "I shall be very glad to pay my respects to Mrs. Harriman and the family, but I can not afford to spend the summer there."

"Why?" he inquired.

"Because I am busy."

"What are you doing?"

"Writing a book."

"Well, you come up to the Lodge and I will show you how to write books. The trouble with you is that you are too slow in your beginnings. You plan and brood too much. Begin, begin, begin! Put forth what you wish to say in the first words that come to mind—just as you talk—until all that's to go in the book is got down. Then correct, transpose, add, strike out, and change as much as you like. Hammer away at it until it suits you. Come and get something begun."

So I went to the famous Lodge, intending to stay a few days or a week; but when I spoke of leaving, Mr. Harriman said I must stay and work, and directed his private secretary to follow me and put down everything I said. So I was fairly compelled to make a beginning, in dictation to a stenographer, which proved rather awkward at first, but in a couple of months a sort of foundation for more than one volume was laid.

Our subject's type was distinctly that of the dynamo, which responds to load until it burns out its insulation. Says Kennan:

Harriman's interest in a piece of work grew as the difficulties that it presented increased. Nothing daunted him, nothing discouraged him, and his confidence in his ability to surmount the most formidable obstacles was never shaken. Indeed, the more difficult the task the more enjoyment he derived from the struggle to accomplish it. Two and a half centuries ago Viscount Halifax, one of the foremost English statesmen of his time, said: "A difficulty raiseth the spirits of a great Man; he hath a mind to wrestle with it and give it a Fall. A Man's Mind must be very low if a difficulty doth not make a part of the Pleasure." These words might have been written with a character like Harriman's in mind.

Harriman's phenomenal success in the field of transportation is attributable not only to his extraordinary intellectual ability, which would doubtless have made him distinguished in any field, but also to his intimate acquaintance with both practical railroading and finance. "If I were asked what is the key to Harriman's success," said one of the greatest bankers in New York ten or twelve years ago, "I should say it is the fact that he is the only man I have ever known who is just as familiar with the physical as the financial side of his properties. Morgan is a great banker, but he knows nothing about the physical side of a railroad. Hill is a great traffic man and railroad builder, but he is a baby when he gets into Wall Street. Harriman knows both ends of the game and knows them well. He started in life as a floor trader and developed into a banker, and when he took hold of the railroad business he put aside the banking and financial end and spent long, hard, and patient years in learning the traffic and operating side. Then he took the two and counterbalanced them. Now he is his own banker and his own traffic manager, and the combination is irresistible."

This characterization of him, presented by Kennan, is by Dr. L. S. Rowe, professor of political science in the University of Pennsylvania:

Mr. Harriman's career furnishes the best instance of one of the fundamental characteristics of the great leaders of industry in the United States and distinguishes them from European men of affairs. The ambition to do real creative work, rather than a mere desire to acquire wealth, was the keynote of Mr. Harriman's activities. In this respect he stands forth as a creative genius, certainly one of the greatest that this country has produced. I have always felt it to be one of the weaknesses of our American democracy that the government can not command the thought and effort of such men in the solution of our great social and political problems.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending May 27, 1922, were $126,100,000; for the week ending May 28, 1921, $108,800,000; an increase of $17,300,000.

With the credit of the United States government back to a 3½ per cent. basis for current financing, high-grade investment preferred stocks, along with bonds, have been making new high records almost daily. The highest grades of investment issues are always the first to respond to declining money rates, but quite as satisfactory profits are often made by purchasing second-grade issues which are slower to get under way, but which often move with a greater degree of certainty for the reason that high-grade issues have already pointed the way, says Forbes Magazine.

There are some very attractive investment opportunities in the shape of industrial preferred stocks which in the past year or so have come very close to losing their dividends. In most cases the companies which maintained out of surplus remains to be seen; but the steel industry has turned the corner and improving earnings should before long find reflection in the market for this stock.

General Motors Corporation 6 per cent. cumulative preferred is outstanding in the amount of $16,183,000. It is not really a preference stock, for it shares equally with the $25,638,000 7 per cent. and the $58,284,000 6 per cent. debenture stock as to both dividends and assets. General Motors has begun to share in the increasing business coming to the motor industry and there is no longer any doubt as the maintenance of its preferred dividend.

The International Paper Company reduced its funded debt from about $12,000,000 to only a little more than $6,000,000 out of its large profits of the past few years. But, on account of the strike which tied up its plants for several months last year and also on account of the drop in paper prices, it was necessary to issue $12,500,000 in 5 per cent. bonds to pay off loans and raise additional working capital. While Paper preferred, as shown by its yield of 8.8 per cent., is not quite out of the doubtful class, the best opinion leans to the belief that improvement in the paper industry, already noticeable, will enable dividends to be maintained.

The earnings outlook of Mack Trucks (formerly International Motor Truck Corporation) is steadily brightening, and its broad service policy along with the quality of its product is building a secure place for it in the future. Since there is no funded debt, the $11,000,000 first preferred stock should rapidly get into a well-secured position once earnings again reach substantial proportions. The dividend is probably safe.

There is only $8,000,000 7 per cent. cumulative preferred stock of Sears, Roebuck Company outstanding, on which earnings have averaged fully 123.51 per cent. annually for the past ten years—including 1921, when nothing was earned on either class of stock. The upturn in prices of farm products has worked decided improvement both in sales and collections of this company and the prospects are that it will very quickly work itself into a strong position again.

U. S. Rubber first preferred has maintained an 8 per cent. dividend for fully seventeen years—which is something of a record. Although earnings slumped seriously last year, the company has managed to get along so far without recourse to new financing, and it seems likely that improvement in the tire branch of its business will alone serve to bring earnings back to a safe level for the senior stock.

In spite of the extremely adverse conditions of the past year the sales of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company amounted to almost exactly $100,000,000, as shown by its annual report, as of March 31, 1922. This is the largest volume of business handled by this company except during the abnormally active previous three years. Manufacturing costs were high, however, as these could not be reduced as rapidly as prices fell. Furthermore, the expense of development work and about $1,500,000 for depreciation of inventory were charged against manufacturing costs, so that the increase in surplus these stocks represent have now seen the nadir of their earnings depression and are already on the upgrade again. But the stocks are still so low that for the ten different issues listed in the table herewith the average yield is fully 7.6 per cent. Such a yield, to be obtained from a diversified list of securities, many of which enjoy a high investment rating, is an aftermath of last year's industrial stress and reflects the slow return of confidence to securities that have once been in the doubtful list.

The long succession of conferences, from Versailles to Genoa, has produced not a little irreverent comment on the part of Mr. Plain Man. Promised a new earth, if not heaven, at the opening of each, unable to realize what has actually been done, his flagging interest in international pow-wows is understandable, say Strassburger & Co.

A shattered world can not be reconstructed in a year or two. The feuds and jealousies of centuries are not so easily extinguished. But much has been done. Meeting each other face to face, masks off, the children of the earth are beginning to understand each other better. Fighting until recently with bare fists, one by one they are shyly putting on gloves, moderating the force of their blows. If "a nasty one" is occasionally got in, who can be surprised? Patience ranks high among the virtues, its growth the slower therefore.

And with the waning of passion, common sense looms on the horizon. It may be that Uncle Sam, listening in, has chuckled too loudly; anyhow, Genoa has completed the rout of the politician. Sorry though we may be for him, we hope Sir Politician is not coming to California to recuperate. A fear suggested by the mooted California Water and Power Act.

When, as lately, the jade Rumor talks in low whispers, you may expect early happenings, and the good news is that two financial conferences have been decided on. The first, a reparations commission, the other an international bankers' conference. On both this country will be represented by a banker, in one a member of the Federal Reserve system. It is practically certain that some modifications of the reparation payments will be the outcome of the connected efforts of the two meetings as a prelude to some form of financing to stabilize Germany's economic conditions and develop Russia's incalculably rich resources.

This decision marks the triumph of the view held all along by American business men that the reconstruction of Europe, so vital to us, could be affected only by private enterprise. Business at the helm, all's well with the world.

Now that business improvement is definitely under way, the foremost problem is that of gauging the rate of expansion and its ultimate limit for a reasonable period ahead, says the National Bank of Commerce of New York in Commerce Monthly. Production should not be recklessly increased, but should expand in relation to a carefully tested market.

In connection with the course of events during the next few months two factors are worthy of consideration, namely, the extent to which output is now below normal and the outlook for exports.

The difficulties of determining what is a normal output are obvious. Population has increased by nearly one-fifth since 1910, and the war irregularly affected the expansion of various industries, so that any standard of measure which may be set up is necessarily arbitrary. At the same time it is the consensus of business judgment that activities during the latter part of 1919 and the opening months of 1920 were above normal, and that operations during the latter part of 1920 and throughout 1921 were below normal, and that a safe rate of production for the United States lies at some point between these extremes. The Harvard Economic Service has endeavored to establish a normal rate for manufactures and to compare production with it from 1919 to date. The results of this work indicate that at no time during the depression, the lowest point being July, 1921, was the volume of manufactures in the United States lower than 70 per cent. of normal. During that month, according to the same source, a sharp upturn took place, and gains since that time have been fairly steady, the manufacturing output of the country at present being perhaps nearly 95 per cent. of normal. Other studies carried on along different lines have shown similar results, but indicate a somewhat lower current rate of operations.

The experience in the recent past of business generally may raise a question as to the accuracy of these estimates, but they have support in several directions. There has unquestionably been much unemployment in the United States, but despite this fact consumption has on the whole been well maintained.

And the greatest of these is— SAFETY

There are many things to consider in buying a bond—marketability, maturity, rate of return, yield, taxability, call provisions, likelihood of enhancement in value.

But, more important than all of these, first and always to be considered, is the permanent safety of your investment.

Your most effectual assurance of safety lies in the selection of a bond house that insists upon adhering to strictly conservative standards. No issue of bonds, for example, is admitted to our list of offerings until we have established its permanent safety, its sound investment merit according to such standards.

From our well-balanced list of safe bonds, you can easily select an issue that meets your investment needs in all respects. Write, phone, or call today for descriptive matter.

What is more convincing evidence, the amount of actual suffering caused by men being out of work has been relatively unimportant compared with preceding depressions of apparently much less severity, and in most districts savings banks deposits either have been maintained or have increased. The conclusion is inevitable that unemployment has not been as widespread as has been indicated by published estimates or by popular opinion. Excess stocks of all kinds have been generally disposed of, stocks of some classes of goods are adequate, and manufacturing output in a number of lines is fairly well adjusted to demand.

In the face of these facts the outlook for Americans exports of all classes is of vital importance. Attention has been called repeatedly to the fact that exports of agricultural products, with the exception of cotton, have been well maintained. The consuming countries are gradually increasing their own agricultural production, but they are also improving their purchasing power, so that exports of American food products will probably continue in satisfactory volume. Cotton exports already show notable gains, and as business gradually improves there is no question that the international market will demand increasing amounts. Gradual resumption of business activities throughout the world will in time take care of American surpluses of other raw materials.

From the standpoint of the immediate business future and likewise from the standpoint of that group of American labor which is as yet unemployed or only partially employed, the outlook for exports of manufactured goods is especially important, and it is in this field that there are now notable grounds for encouragement. In March exports of manufactured goods from the United States amounted to $156,000,000, the largest since April, 1921. No details are as yet available for April, 1922. During March exports of those iron and steel products which are reported on a tonnage basis amounted to 208,843 tons, compared with 133,975 tons in February, 1922 and 230,635 tons in March, 1921. Taken in connection with broadening inquiries and an improved export outlook as reported by the largest iron and steel producers, the evidence seems to be conclusive that the American manufacturers in these lines can successfully compete in the world's markets and that those markets are reviving. Export results are encouraging in other directions. Exports of automobiles, trucks, and tractors are increasing. There is a broadening inquiry for cotton textiles in those countries to which the United States has normally exported. Exports of those specialties for which the United States has long been noted, such as typewriters, dental supplies, and similar types of equipment, are all being well maintained with an outlook for an increased volume.

Thus while on the one hand it is evident that production must be increased carefully so as to avoid the risk of overloading the domestic market, the consuming power of which may easily be overestimated, there is evidence on the other hand that foreign markets will take care of reasonable surpluses. The outlook is for a period of relatively stable and satisfactory business.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

A woman writer of the new, that is to say, objective school wrote the other day that the real hero of almost all novels was the heroine; that practically all writers, men or women, write about women because they are more interesting. The lady in question must have overlooked Mr. H. G. Wells. Practically all of Mr. Wells' books from the early "Kippis" to "Tono Bungay," and from "Bealby" to "Mr. Britling," are novels almost exclusively about men, particularly the hero whom Mr. Wells is psychoanalyzing at the moment. "The Secret Places of the Heart" (Macmillan) is no exception to the Wells tradition. Two masculinized girls, one woman, and a lady cross its pages, but it is essentially the story of a man—of the typical Wells man, a little coarse, a little vulgar, a little repulsive, and one hundred per cent. virile animal. Mr. Wells' heroes all are haunted by what George Gissing calls the "devil sex." The author would doubtless interpolate here that his hero is a man and not a heroine, and hence the qualities noted here, but we would remind Mr. Wells that it takes all kinds to make a world and that his hero is, after all, always one kind—the kind described above.

"The Secret Places of the Heart" is a very readable, very long pamphlet, setting forth in a dizzy number of conversations and soliloquies Mr. Wells' opinion of the status quo of society. It is that and nothing more. Those who objected to the discursive abstractness of "Mr. Britling Sees It Through" would agree that that book was an exemplary Victorian novel compared to "The Secret Places of the Heart," which is nevertheless more brilliantly written and a shade less exasperating in its leisureliness. In "Mr. Britling Sees It Through" Wells showed his own exasperation at having to call a halt in theorizing occasionally and impatiently shove the story ahead a bit. In "The Secret Places of the Heart" he dispenses with this disturbing factor by the simple expedient of dispensing with the story. The result is that things go swimmingly and one gets to the point quickly—a much better method for a pamphleteer than that followed in "Mr. Britling." The chief pleasure for the non-socialist reader, who is not going to have the vicarious joy of having his unformed opinions expressed for him by Mr. Wells, is the ever recurring quaint symbol, simile, and epigram. The doctor, whose old-fashioned virtues make him a striking protagonist for Sir Richmond's new-fashioned lack of virtues, is responsible for this: "Progress has trivialized women and woman has trivialized civilization." However, the Wellsian Sir Richmond has better ones to his credit: "This planet is a little ball of oxides and nickel steel; life a sort of tarnish on its surface"—and this: "Our souls were made in the squatting-place of the sub-men of ancient times. They are made out of primitive needs and they die before our bodies as those needs are satisfied." So, much for quotations, though we are tempted to give a dozen more. "The Secret Places of the Heart" will repay any of the old Wells guard. It is not likely to make any new converts for him.

Arthur Machen is just beginning to be generally known. Just why he is not better known is something of a mystery, as his friends and admirers constitute a ceaseless press agency for him, and his work is of the nature of such popular writers as Quiller-Couch, Hewlett, Cabell. That is to say that Mr. Machen's atmosphere is saturated with beauties to which the common herd is blind and anæsthetic. Mr. Cabell is of the opinion that the thirty years' neglect "that has been accorded to Mr. Machen is the sort of crime that ought to be discussed in the biblical manner, from the nousetop." Carl Van Vechten is another free publicity agent for Mr. Machen's ware. With all due deference to the critical faculties of these two gentlemen, we think that Mr. Machen's oblivion is neither the result of public stupidity nor yet of any peculiar curse that dogs his fate. The explanation is rife all over Mr. Machen's copy. He is too precious, too remote, too chaotic for general consumption. True, he writes like an arch-seraph, but comparatively few people are such devotees of exquisite prose that they will read something that either reminds them of the inconsequential trouble of a nightmare or, in its less rarified moments, jostles their sense of the ridiculous. A constant fluctuation between these two experiences was the fate of this reviewer in reading "The House of Souls" (Knopf), which is, nevertheless, the most poetic prose we have ever read. As for the greatness of Mr. Machen about which one is beginning to hear so much, we call to the attention of enthusiasts that mere virtuosity is not greatness. It may be argued that Machen is more a genius than a virtuoso—his marvelously surfaced style is probably instinctive—but he resembles the latter in that he has so little to say beyond the vague suggesting of unearthly beauty—after subject for poetry than prose. And again his genius is of the unbalanced order reminiscent of William Blake rather than of any contemporary. He reminds one in his unearthly naïveté of Blake a great deal. However, when all is said, it is highly problematic whether any one so lacking in humor—we say this despite the few sadly funny touches in "The House of Souls"—can ever be a general favorite or a major genius. He will continue to enchant his special, audience of devotees to the fine art of prose, and that audience is very small. Hence Mr. Machen's comparative oblivion. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

A moving picture illustrating and explaining the Einstein theory is said to have been made in Germany.

Justin Huntly McCarthy has written a semi-autobiographical novel, called "Truth and the Other Thing."

The Houghton Mifflin Company has recently published an anthology of French poetry ranging from the twelfth century to Samain and Maclair. The collection is the work of Wilfred Thorley and is called "Fleur de Lys."

M. Rostovtzeff in "Greeks and Iranians in South Russia: A Study of Their Art" attempts to describe and put in their historical place the astonishing wealth of the Greek, Scythian, and Sarmatian finds in South Russia. The Oxford University Press American Branch has the volume nearly ready.

D. Appleton & Co. are the publishers of Hilaire Belloc's latest, "The Mercy of Allah"—a satire on modern business and society.

That the public has not lost its zest for mystery stories is shown by the recent report from a leading New York book store that A. A. Milne's "The Red House Mystery" tops the list of fiction best sellers. This is a Dutton book, as were the author's two volumes of essays, "Not That It Matters" and "If I May."

Margaret Rivers Larminie, whose first novel, "Search," was recently published by Putnam's, is in private life Mrs. R. C. Tragett, famous in English athletic circles. Mrs. Tragett, who edits the Badminton Gazette, held the Badminton title for England in 1911 and 1912. Badminton is an English game similar to tennis, but more strenuous.

Francis Charles MacDonald, honorary secretary of the United States Embassy at Tokyo under Roland Morris, 1917-1920, is the author of a book of poems, "Devices and Desires," to be brought out by the Princeton University Press early in June. After publishing his novel, "Sorcery," Mr. MacDonald returned to resume his work in the department of English in Princeton University.

Albert J. Kinross, the English author of the recently published "The Truth About Vignolles" (Century), was at one time an agent, a bookkeeper, and finally a versifier in a Christmas card factory. Mr. Kinross is well known as a novelist and short story writer.

With the books issued by Charles Scribner's Sons on May 12th the Scribner list of spring publications is virtually complete. The books which appeared on that date included the "Memoirs of the Crown Prince of Germany"; Lothrop Stoddard's "The Revolt Against Civilization"; "Chronicles of Cicora Wood," by Elizabeth W. Allston Pringle, a volume of recollections of the "old" South; "The Family Man," a play by John Galsworthy, and a new novel, "Where Your Treasure Is," by John Hastings Turner, whose "Simple Souls" was a conspicuous success a number of years ago. Two new volumes were added to the Modern Students' Library—Meredith's "Evan Harrington" and Stevenson's "Tae Master of Ballantrae."

A promising book of memoirs is soon to be published in England, by "George Egerton," the pioneer of the Keynote Series, who is Mrs. Golding Bright in private life. George Egerton's book will be called "Things I Meant to Tell You," and will be a record of a remarkable career. As a child, the author spent 101 days in a sailing ship which rounded Cape Horn in terrific weather; and she had her first tooth out in the Falkland Islands. During her girlhood she visited many countries and saw a little of the Spanish-Chilian war from a traveling coach on the coast. She was familiar with Bohemian life in Dublin and London and her memoirs will be peopled with celebrities.

Authors who acknowledge their debt to Boccaccio, from whom Chaucer and Shakespeare both largely borrowed, include Swinburne, Longfellow, George Eliot, and Tennyson.

Among the new fiction on the fall list of the Macmillan Company are novels by Alice Brown, Edgar Lee Masters, Eden Phillpotts, Warwick Deeping, Ernest Poole, and Amelia J. Burr, and a new volume of sea stories by Lincoln Colcord. There are new plays by St. John Ervine, Andreyev, and Wilfrid Wilson

Joseph Hergesheimer is said to have a weakness for speaking before women's clubs—though he does not often get a second invitation from the same club. Probably nine-tenths of his readers are women, but he takes a delight in belittling their intelligence, to their faces. He was once invited to speak before a certain club in Chicago. From sheer perversity he failed to appear, and when, later, no concern was shown about his absence, he called up his hostess repeatedly begging for another lecture date.

A new opera, "The Tower of the Voivod," by the famous Hungarian pianist, Dohnanyi, has been presented with great success in Budapest. Of the music one critic has said, "It is the achievement of a musical Benvenuto Cellini. . . . The legitimate weapons of art only are used."

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Joining in Public Discussion.

The first book in a series to be known as the Worker's Bookshelf has just been issued by the George H. Doran Company. "Joining in Public Discussion," by Alfred Dwight Sheffield, professor of English literature at Wellesley College, is a manual of effective speech-making. It is a practical guide for both the educated man who lacks experience and self-confidence in public speaking and for the foreigner and uneducated worker who needs to cultivate the very basis of speaking, good English. Professor Sheffield's book will help any one who has occasion to join in public discussion. The Worker's Bookshelf is being created to meet the need for more social understanding. Books brief enough, clear enough, and inexpensive enough should be within the reach of all who have but limited opportunities for widening their social outlook. The series will include art, literature, and the natural sciences as well as the social sciences, and will be distinctive for its scientific attitude and for scholarship.

The Personal Touch.

A typical "smart set" story of French titles, American heiresses, stolen jewels, and social intrigue is "The Personal Touch," by Emma Beatrice Brunner. Mrs. Brunner has a rather unusual plot for her mystery story, which is cleverly manipulated—the mystery being well managed throughout. In fact "The Personal Touch" has a double plot, as every good mystery story must have in order to conceal the undercurrent which is the real plot. So De Guity's affairs mask those of Jack Olmstead, the gentleman—chief hero of "The Personal Touch." Mrs. Brunner, who was Emma Beatrice Kaufman, daughter of Rosalie Kaufman, one-time president of the Century Club, is a San Francisco woman.

The House of Rimmon.

Mary S. Watts in "The House of Rimmon" has introduced to a long-suffering public one more of the tribe of stories dealing with the efforts of a poor but earnest youth to achieve glory in the world of letters. Through the background of literary New York, with an occasional side-track to Bermuda and the Middle West, Cleve Harrod pursues his way, attempting to write successfully without lowering his standards. Uncongenial home life during his youth, an infatuation for a "social butterfly," whose "clear strong soul" (and equally strong snobishness) precludes the usual ending to an affair of this sort, marriage to a woman he doesn't love, with a few minor trials such as poverty, form a series of blows from fate that end rather cheerlessly with the death of his wife and a late success as a popular playwright.

Among minor faults, such as inaccuracy in the use of words (Can eyes be at once sapphire and aquamarine in color?), are tediousness and a stiff, heavy style. Miss Watts' most glaring fault, that of being unconvincing, strikes the reader of "The House of Rimmon" immediately. We are given a young man of twenty, weak, conceited, and generally unattractive. Full justice is done to his character in forty pages or so. We understand him more or less thoroughly. Suddenly, after a few pages of description, introduction of new people, etc., we find him entirely changed. In the twinkling of an eye he has become clear-sighted, tenacious of his purpose, and so attractive as to be termed "god-like" by the author. It leaves us feeling rather like the child from whose pocket the conjurer has drawn a rabbit: that it isn't natural.

Besides this neglect of the reader's desire for reasonableness, which continues throughout, lack of balance and stressing of the so-called human interest (depending chiefly upon the use of very poor English by the sweet young wife) do not tend to correct the reader's first impression that "The House of Rimmon" is decidedly third-rate.

Pinero's Social Plays.

The fourth and last volume of the library edition of "The Social Plays of Arthur Wing Pinero" has just been issued, presenting "The Thunderbolt" and "Mid-Channel." These two plays, in which Pinero is generally considered to have reached the height of his craftsmanship, were written at the height of his career, when, as he has frankly stated, he could afford to please himself. American theatre-goers will remember Ethel Barrymore in the leading rôle in "Mid-Channel," which had a successful run of more than a year in this country.

The first volume of the series contains "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" and "The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith," "Iris" and "The Gay Lord Quex" make up the second, and "Letty" and "His House in Order" are included in the third volume.

A Negro Officer.

Those who may have read in a recent Washington dispatch of the death in Liberia of Colonel Charles Young, U. S. A., retired, were unlikely to have got the interesting story involved therein, says the "Knave" in the Oakland Tribune. Colonel Young was a coal black negro, the first one to get through West Point. Cadet Whittaker tried it some fifty years ago, but was unable to stand the inevitable ostracism. His case resulted in a congressional investigation that was the sensation of the time.

Young stuck it out, and won the soldierly respect of officers and men. He has six feet tall and well proportioned; he was versed in a dozen languages, and soft spoken, gentle, and it is the testimony of one who knew him that "no one in the army or out of it who came in contact with him failed to respect him." Yet he was a typical negro, not alone in color, but in cranial and lineament characteristics. As a young officer many years ago he was stationed at the Presidio, and met and fell in love with a handsome mulatto girl, employed as a maid by a wealthy lady who had a house on Pacific Avenue overlooking the Presidio. On the advice of the lady the girl married the colored officer. To avoid embarrassments that would be inevitable with his promotion and advance in the army, about fifteen years ago he was tendered and accepted the appointment of military attaché of the Republic of Liberia.

To Meet All Water Needs

A ten per cent. increase in San Francisco's daily water needs would use up all the water that is immediately available for delivery by this company.

The City is growing all the time, and it is imperative that the water supply grow, too.

Enlargement of the water supply should not merely keep pace with City growth—it should keep ahead of it.

For a number of years past, though there has been no actual water shortage, the margin between the supply capacity and the use has been too narrow.

It is imperative that that margin be widened.

To meet the urgency of this need, the Railroad Commission rendered a decision in August last year, and in March of this year the Board of Supervisors unanimously approved a water aqueduct contract with this company.

As a result of this cooperation Calaveras Reservoir in the Alameda branch of the Spring Valley system will be developed so as to add 24 million gallons daily to the water supply of San Francisco.

The water supply available to San Francisco will be increased from 42 to 66 million gallons daily.

Thus San Francisco will obtain abundant water to satisfy all needs for years to come, including the industrial needs that will develop with the stimulation of manufactures, and the domestic needs that will arise with the opening of new residential districts.

"LA TENDRESSE."

In presenting Henri Bataille's play in its entirety to an American audience Henry Miller has tried one of his courageous experiments. Nothing, apparently, or almost nothing, as I remember the play in its French form, is eliminated or changed, for he is giving us a translation, and not an adaptation.

The result is that we are having the unusual opportunity of seeing here in San Francisco a good and carefully studied stage reproduction of a play written for the Parisian public by one of the most famous of French dramatists.

Bataille, who, like D'Annunzio, is, or was, a minute analyst of the erotics of love, has conceived the idea of presenting a woman—a charming flower sprung from Parisian soil—who has a profound, delicately tender and cherishing affection for her middle-aged lover, but who, while striving in every way but one to minister to his happiness, reserves to herself the right to adventures in gallantry on the outside. This eminently French situation—the irregularly regular ménage, I mean—is presented by Bataille with the matter-of-factness with which the French regard this sort of well-established institution in the literary Bohemia of Paris. For Barnac, the lover, is a famous writer of comedies, and one of the Forty Immortals, while Marthe is the dainty stage interpreter of his most famous women characters.

"La Tendresse" is of the very essence of French drama. Once upon a time it would have been quite impossible to place before an American audience a piece depicting unapologetically the social irregularities which characterize the lives of Paris' literary Bohemians. But times have changed. They began to change before the war, and since its close Americans feel an immense curiosity about the people, the national character, the social institutions of other countries; and above all of France.

No doubt in gratifying this curiosity by his accurate presentation of "La Tendresse," which is in the nature of a try-out, Henry Miller has wished to discover what portions of the play are least interesting to an American audience. And by this time he has doubtless discovered that those little genre lights and shades, so acceptable to a French audience, to whom every allusion is as familiar as our talk here about national topics that are in the air, such as the sins of Congress and the labor party, do not reach the interest of Americans.

The play begins with an interview between Barnac and a dignitary of the church. It was excellently done by Henry Miller and Elmer Brown—a faithful reproduction of the thing as it might happen in Paris: two men of the world, each of whom is honored in his own wholly different sphere, coming together and exchanging those exquisite courtesies incidental to their discourse which the French alone have so perfectly developed.

But to an average American audience, unaware of the intrigues and manoeuvres practiced by aspirants for Academy membership to attain the cherished honor, the scene will lack interest.

It was not, indeed, until in a subsequent strictly masculine conversation the audience felt itself on the trail of the sentimental imbroglio, that its interest was fully aroused in this scene. Then the auditors suddenly became tense, and the players must have deeply enjoyed that blessed sensation of calming a restless audience into attentive immobility as Barnac put the questions that showed how fully aroused had suddenly become his suspicions of Marthe's good faith.

From this time the interest was well sustained, although it is impossible for an American audience to be held in a close and all-comprehending sympathy to the flow of dialogue and situations in a foreign play as it would be, for instance, for a Parisian audience to enter with full sympathy and instinctive understanding into the motives upon which are constructed such essentially American plays as "The Country Cousin," or "Clarence," or "Three Wise Fools," or "Come Out of the Kitchen." Life, the mental attitude, national character, social institutions, traditions, all are different, and it is inevitable that the dominating attitude in the foreign witness of a representative play is that of slightly baffled curiosity. Love always oils the wheels of drama. Barnac wins the sympathy of the audience and Marthe in Ruth Chatterton's role so attracts by her prettiness, her vivacuity, and her capacity for a deep and genuine affection for her elderly lover, that the emotion of sympathy is also definitely captured.

In witnessing this play it was patent how little interruption to the current of sentimental drama, save in the way of wit and humor, is desired by an American audience. In "La Tendresse" Bataille, by innumerable minute but, to the more intelligent French, indispensable suggestions, sought to give a perfectly natural picture of the life lived by Barnac and those surrounding him. When Fernal and Legardier entered they embarked, as a matter of course, upon some conversation preliminary to the real issue, which is the discovery made by Barnac, from an allusion, that he has grounds for suspicion of his charming little singing bird. An American audience, however, wants the preliminaries to be of the briefest. "Down to brass tacks" is its motto, while the French rejoice in the leisurely exquisite finish with which all of these little natural touches are rendered.

Also, in the long, intimate, tender communion between Barnac and Marthe toward the close, in which they agree to let friendship take the place of passion, an American audience prefers greater brevity. For, indeed, one of our national faults as auditors to drama is that of a sort of youthful impatience.

It is evident that most careful preparations were made for an intelligent presentation of the play. The cast is very long, and several familiar local figures were pressed into service, among them William Hanley of the Players, who, after his one neatly played scene as a male ingénue, was followed by the glad sound of applause.

Mr. Miller, no doubt, chose "La Tendresse" partly because of the opportunity afforded him in the rôle of Barnac, Marthe's mature lover, and partly because he recognized that Ruth Chatterton had the brains to give a spirited conception of Marthe. For her Marthe is cerebral rather than emotional; a quick-witted, dancing, glancing, shrewdly estimating, life-devouring combination of canary and nightingale. For that magical enchantment of emotion which a nightingale can express Marthe can feel. She is dual-natured, and beside her beautiful capacity for a delicate-minded affection exist strictly materialistic desire for another and more earthly love, as Barnac finds to his cost.

Naturally an American company, even as good a one as Mr. Miller's, can not seem French. But Ruth Chatterton came very near to it. She had greatly altered her appearance by making herself a pronounced brunette. It made us much more readily accept her as a delightfully pretty French girl, and the characteristic manner she assumed for Marthe was excellently conceived. I thought her mute, stricken recognition of the meaning of Barnac's stratagem when he had her read aloud the conversation his secretary had typed from her shorthand notes of Marthe's talk with her lover quite the best of Miss Chatterton's more emotional scenes; more so than in her tearful exit from Barnac's life. She, indeed, did extremely well with the rôle, and between them she and Henry Miller made most effective foils, one for the other, in the rôles of May and December.

The general company did good team work throughout, Bruce McRae appearing in a small rôle as an elderly Frenchman of distinguished appearance, Blanche Bates as a gallantly endured successor to Marthe in the chivalrous Barnac's characteristically Bohemian household.

They couldn't appear to be French; that was impossible. But they gave an intelligent and well-acted representation of a French play and French situations. And Mr. Miller showed judgment and good taste in having the company handle the essentially French situations in the play with appropriate matter-of-factness; a French or Latin attitude which we are beginning dimly to understand, and which no Anglo-Saxon has better conveyed than Arnold Bennett in his transcription of a Parisian family having a perfectly matter-of-fact conversation at table over the irregular love affairs of the son of the house.

Bataille has written an immense number of plays, and I have repeatedly heard "La Tendresse" spoken of his best. But of his numerous erotic heroines the affairs of the interesting bourgeoisie whose suddenly warmed-up temperament involved her in the threatened domestic tragedy of "Le Scandale" seems to have left the deepest impression on my consciousness. But women, I think, would respond with keener interest to the social and domestic upheaval that menaced the life of a hitherto irreproachable woman, while men would enjoy more the flavor of Paris' literary Bohemianism as represented in "La Tendresse" and, perhaps, the sentimental side of Barnac's character and affairs. For when men are sentimentalists they are thorough-going ones.

An extraordinary amount of interest, by the way, has been aroused by Mr. Miller's promised presentation of Bataille's last play, as the result of which the Columbia was filled to bursting on Monday night, even the most disadvantageous seats being occupied.

And it should be added that people not only in the far, but the middle distances, agreed in the criticism that the general performance was, vocally, pitched too low. Among the principals the player wholly exempt from this criticism was Geoffrey Kerr, even Paul Harvey being flayed a little for his inaudibility in the scene with Marthe, while the man servant was scored for announcing every guest in an obsequious whisper.

"THE GREAT LOVER."

Mr. Dittrichstein and the Hattons collaborated in evolving "The Great Lover," which, it will be remembered, had quite a long run in New York some years ago. It is a romantic comedy, and shows the childlike volatility of Jean Paurel, Latin opera singer, in a light which recalls to us, although less wittily, the figure of that gay, lovable, universal wooer in "The Concert."

"The Great Lover," however, had so attracted the public during its vogue that when Kellard, the Shakespearean actor, was last here playing a season at the Columbia he put the play on because he thought its Eastern vogue would cause it to make profitable appeal to the curiosity of San Franciscans.

Kellard, however, has not within him that wooing, coaxing way with women which Dittrichstein, whatever it may be in reality, makes to seem like second nature on the stage, and so public attention was not greatly attracted to his representation.

All the Hatton plays are essentially light, "The Great Lover" with the rest. Plays of that type do not last, and possibly "The Great Lover" is a little shop-worn. Still there is so much bustle in it, such a number of operatic personalities, so many characters, and such an animated if not psychologically profound depiction of the kind of people who sing for us on the operatic stage, their moods, tenses, jealousies, rebellions, together with the perplexities and tempests that rage around the desk of the general manager, that the spectators derive considerable entertainment from the piece. They do not criticize its lack of just being off the frying-pan, so to speak, and Dittrichstein is such a favorite that they enjoy an impersonation which is very little different from his representation of the character of Toto.

In "The Great Lover" the star is representing a man in the fifties still haloed by the prestige of his past operatic triumphs, although it is his art, and not his failing voice, which persuades the public that he is still a great singer. A young rival is there to push him on to supreme effort, and we are witnesses to the dramatic moment when his voice suddenly fails him, and, like a flash, the light of his halo is quenched.

The romance in the play is purely conventional. The audience takes it calmly because of the essential volatility of Paurel's character. They are pleased to see the numerous company in their various impersonations, and enjoy the sub rosa plots, schemes, and jealousies, and the general suggestion of polyglotness borne out by the company.

But, in spite of the many characters and small happenings, it is the character of Paurel which dominates, and the impersonation by Dittrichstein of the chronic wooer of pretty women—of which, by the way, there is a liberal supply in the company—greatly tickles the spectators, more particularly as the universal wooer is finally caught in a romantic attachment.

The last note struck, however, is that of levity, which is well, being consistent with the outline of the character of "the great lover." And so, although Paurel is deprived both of voice and sweetheart, it is to the sound of laughter that the curtain falls.

TIVOLI REDEVIVUS.

Old Tivoli records will play an important part in the theatrical history of San Francisco. Numbers of middle-aged persons that paid high for operatic enjoyment during the recent notable opera seasons at the Exposition Auditorium received their first impressions of opera at the old Tivoli. Some of the old familiar names—Salassa, Collamarini—seem to be forgotten; but they are still remembered, cherished, and occasionally spoken of by the old guard. Others—Agostini, Tetrizzini, and more still—have risen to fame or high honors, and sung on the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Widely diverse were the operatic representations at the old house. Sometimes the performances had merit; but on other occasions they would pluckily try to make an operatic summer with only one swallow. How the real opera singers must have shuddered when the imitation ones—small church singers, local chorus girls, hopeful but untrained young aspirants for operatic glory—sang all around the pitch—as we heard them once during a gruesome execution of "Lohengrin"—and cut it dead in every number.

Sometimes the Tivoli impresario would dig out from somewhere in Europe, or South America, or Mexico, old but well-trained opera singers who were perfectly sure of themselves, and calmly, silently, but completely contemptuous of the zealous local support supplied them. There was one hard-boiled dame of fifty-five or sixty—perhaps more—who had serenely and unabashedly renounced all the vanities of life. She was the leading soprano, but she looked more like an old clo' woman, or a masseuse hunting for a job. Fearful and wonderful was the aspect of this fair lady as she appeared in the rôle of Aida, attired in a tasteful aggregation of woven feather dusters. And immutable was the haughty self-possession with which she spat upon the stage whenever she felt thereto impelled. But the old girl, although completely destructive to illusion, was thoroughly up to her job.

These opera seasons, however, were interludes to the chronic reign of merriment at the Tivoli, home of comic opera. One radical departure that was made, however, was more momentous than was realized at the time.

Edwin Stevens, the then comedian at the Tivoli, and an excellent legitimate actor, felt a desire to play the title-rôle in "Cyrano de Bergerac," the vogue of which was sweeping over the world. The management consented, and thus San Francisco made its first acquaintance with the famous Rostand play, which is now banished from the American stage by a freak court decision which pronounced it a plagiarism on the work of an obscure native dramatist.

Paul Steindorff and Ferris Hartman are closely identified with the Tivoli's successful days. During the operatic interludes Ferris Hartman used to head a comic opera company touring on the Coast circuit. But Paul Steindorff was indispensable during these operatic seasons, and remained to figure as conductor.

And now, after a long period of years, these two old associates have come together again as partners, and are giving a season of the old Tivoli successes in the Auditorium Theatre in Oakland.

They have imported a New York company and plan to give, besides "The Idol's Eye"—which opened the reason this week—a number of the old favorites: "Madame Sherry," "The Toymaker," "The Merry Widow," and so on.

But what's eating us here in San Francisco is their choice of Oakland. It is nice for Oakland, but why didn't they throw the hand-kerchief over way? Well, well, it must be because we had no theatre for them; which reflection partly soothes our wounded feelings.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

Among the stage events announced for the Columbia Theatre, Elsie Janis and her gang, who will open a two weeks' engagement there Monday night, June 5th, should awaken more than passing interest. The popular comedienne is said to have the best show of her career.

The "gang," as Elsie calls her supporting players, is composed of ex-service men whom she met in France during the war. Two years ago the little mimic produced a revue based upon some of her experiences with the American army in France, and her present show is fashioned along the same lines minus the uniform and the war.

"Mr. Pim Passes By," with Laura Hope Crews in the star rôle, will follow Elsie Janis at the Columbia.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Singer's Midgets are coming; thirty tiny men and women, every one of whom is an artist and an individual headliner. There will be a wild animal circus, feats of horsemanship, echoes from the concert and song world, exhibitions of magic, a display of muscular development, a hunting scene, a fashion revue, a snatch of cowboy acrobatic pastime, a dream spectacle, a boxing bout, a military drill—all this and more, executed by men and women not one of whom is more than three feet three inches in height.

Edith Clifford is a comedienne, pleasing to the eye and ear.

A play without listening ears would be impossible, and while "I Heard—!!!" is responsible for unlimited discord it is also the cause of much fun, and it is to this purpose that Paul Decker and Edwin Burke are using it.

A piano is just what the player makes of it. Ned Norworth is positive that its real purpose is comedy and therefore he proceeds in a little display of eccentric variety to demonstrate just how a piano may be made to be a comedian. With the instrument he manages to portray all kinds of levity, farce, burlesque, straight comedy and travesty.

The Browne Sisters are young, pretty, and clever, with much musical ability.

The famous picture of "The Men of Clay" might have been dedicated to Yost and Clady. From a mass of wet mud they model skillfully and artistically.

Wellington Cross appears again.

Open Air Opera.

Famous artists, supported by a chorus of 150, a ballet of fifty, and orchestra of 110, will sing the operas "T'Pagliacci," "Carmen," and "Faust" in the great open-air theatre at Stanford University June 3d, 7th, 10th and 16th. Two Sunday afternoon concerts will be given, these with the operas comprising a musical festival distinctive among those of the entire country.

"We are drawing upon the entire country for our musical talent," explained Getano Morela, the director. "From New York we are bringing Giovanni Martinelli, the world's leading tenor; Léon Rother, the bass, and Ina Bourskaja, the sensational Russian Carmen—all from the Metropolitan Opera Company. From the Chicago Opera Association we are bringing Bianca Saroya, the soprano. Among the local people in the cast will be Doria Fernanda, Georgianna Strauss, and Marsden Argall."

The beneficiaries of the open-air opera season are: Stanford University endowment fund, Stanford Clinic in San Francisco, fund for the enlargement of the organ in the Memorial Church, and Home for Convalescent Children on Stanford campus.

Ferrier in an English Part

M. André Ferrier, who on Wednesday evening wound up the season at his French theatre by a final performance of the famous old classic, "Le Voyage de M. Perrichon," will on June 16th make his first public appearance in an English-speaking rôle. He will on that occasion enact the rôle of Jean Valjean with the Pacific Players, who will give a performance of Norman McKinnel's "The Bishop's Candlesticks" at Sorois Hall; the other offering on the bill being "Carrots," a one-act play by Jules Renaud, with which Ethel Barrymore was identified in her earlier acting days, and in which she was seen in San Francisco.

THE AMERICAN GIRL ANALYZED.

Paul Bourget, the eminent French novelist and psychologist, in "Les Annales" observes that the apotheosis of woman in America is first and above all the apotheosis of the young girl. He says:

"What strikes the traveler who has heard so much of the young American girl is the absolute impossibility of distinguishing her from the young married woman. The fact, so much commented upon, that they come and go all alone would not be sufficient to cause this confusion. The identity goes further. They wear the same jewels, the same dresses, have the same liberty of laughter and language, the same reading, the same gestures, the same full-blown beauty, and, thanks to the invention of the 'chaperon,' there is no theatre or dinner party, no tea, to which they do not go, always alone and upon the invitation of no matter what man of their acquaintance.

"The quality of this official surveillance is measured by that other fact that the young girl in whose honor the bachelor organizes a party usually chooses this chaperon herself. The young widow and the 'grass' widow answer the ideal conditions of the rôle. This means, in other words, that the young girls who go to fashionable restaurants in the company of young men and a chaperon, or who go to a tea at another young man's house, are as free as if there was no one to answer for them than they themselves.

"This habit of conducting themselves without other control is manifested in the singular assurance of their physiognomies. One of the most amiable men of New York, who is a poet, conceived the idea of making a museum of miniatures in which all the professional beauties of the town appeared. I remember that in examining with the magnifying glass the plates from which those pretty and delicate faces smiled, I looked in vain for those on which marriage had impressed its influence, and I did not find them. What will, in fact, marriage bring them when it comes? Duties, a husband to submit to, children to attend, a house to manage. Today the young girl has not the weight of any of these bonds. She knows it and feels that she is having the best time of her life. Most of them do not conceal this sentiment.

"We must amuse ourselves before marriage," one among them said to me gayly. 'Who knows what may come afterward?'

"The divorce suits go to show that this young person had as much good sense as beauty. On my part, and after having looked close at human conditions, I think that for a young man of twenty-five the most complete chances of happiness are to be an Englishman of good family and finishing his studies at Oxford, and for a young girl, to be born an American, of a father who has made his fortune in the mines, the railroads, or real estate speculations, and to arrive with good sponsors in the society of New York or Washington."

The Sun Is Blue.

This question "why the sky is blue" is answered by M. L. Houllevigne in his scientific causeries of Le Temps. "All the daylight," he says, "comes from the sun, but it arrives here by different ways. The direct light, that which forms the solar rays, has grown weak by its passing through the atmosphere, slightly for the red light, more so for the blue. The diffused light of the sky, where the blue predominates, is made up of all that the direct radiation lacks. The blue of the sky is taken from the sun itself, and the result is that we do not see the royal star under its true color. If by some miracle, which science will perhaps realize, we could rise about a hundred kilometers above the diffusing layers of the atmosphere the solar disc would appear to us, not white, but bluish, standing out in relief on a black sky, where stars glitter at full noon. In this way it would appear to the 'men in the moon' if the moon were inhabited.

"And this vision of science perfectly agrees with what we know of the solar temperature. Physicists admit that the radiant surface, the photosphere, is not far from a temperature of 6000 degrees C.; it is, therefore, hotter than the yellowish flame of our gas burners, than the white light of our electric lamps, and than the electric arc itself, whose color is bluish. Now, it is known that the hotter a radiant body is the richer it is in blue and violet. Therefore, the sun is blue."

M. Houllevigne explains that it is the strong absorption of the direct solar light by particles of dust, tiny drops of water that impart to twilight its exquisite colors.

Guardian of the Birds.

On the northernmost point of the Shetland Islands, closer to the Pole than Petrograd, is a little hut where every spring a man goes to watch over the birds, says the Living Age. Mr. H. Edwardson has occupied his lonely hut from spring to autumn for thirty-three years as a watcher for the British Society for the Protection of Birds. The work of the society has borne fruit, for the number of the birds has greatly increased since the watcher was placed there. Skuas, great northern divers, fulmars, and golden plover are all increasing in number, while colonies of gannets are growing on the cliffs. The birds have come to recognize the watcher, and the skuas even come to the door of his hut in quest of food when he reopens it each spring.

GATO GOSSIP

He Wanted a 10c Cigar

Overheard yesterday in an uptown cigar store:

Customer: "Got a good 10c cigar?"

Cigarman: "Sure, here's a Gato."

Customer: "Gato? Never heard of a 10c Gato."

Cigarman: "Hasn't been on the market long but it's a winner. Going big."

Customer: "Pretty good, is it?"

Cigarman: "Fine. It is one of the few long filler Pure Havana Cigars you can get for 10c . . . . Yes sir, 5 for 50c. Thank you."

Mr. Gato himself couldn't have said more.

VANITY FAIR.

Yale's commencement this year has been heralded, not with triumphant trumpets, but with a cry of fear and agony, lest this occasion heretofore sacred to masculinity and its distinctive interests be turned into a baby show. While the individual father may have "pointed with pride" to his achievement in bringing forth a class baby, forgetting the far more strenuous labors of the family physician, not to mention friend wife, the alumni as a whole have been "viewing with alarm" the tendency of the aforesaid individual he-parent, in numbers, to invite or at least to tolerate the presence of that baby and its natural appendage, the mother, at the class reunions. The practice has grown year after year by imitation of evil example, until a rush of feminism and infantism threatens to submerge the whole male festival. It is felt that the time is critical, and a false move may cost men the battle. The warning-and-appeal, tragic and pitiful, has gone forth in the form of a letter from Fairfax Downey of Kansas City to all other good Yale men, calling on them to stand fast against the blandishments that would undermine their last foothold and citadel. Says Downey:

"Stand fast, men! One false motion and we'll have a flock of relatives upon us. From year to year mothers of class babies have put in a surreptitious appearance, lurking in the grandstand and watching with fond concentration the antics of their first-born. They have been modest and unobtrusive about it and have known their place. They have spoiled only papa's time, but that was his lookout, and the penalty went with the production of a class baby. But we entertain the fear that more mothers are beginning to confer their presence upon us. And where mothers slip in what's to hinder a brace of grandmas per kid, to say nothing of a bevy of aunts and other doting female relatives? This may seem a dire prophecy, but we venture to predict that the appearance upon the diamond of a class baby will soon elicit such a chorus of 'Ohs' and 'Ahs' and 'Isn't he cutes' as will drown out the cheers for a home run.

"When a mother brings a class baby some other mother of later date will be certain to trot along her own little darling. It will be a case of bring one, bring all, and what was once a joyous gathering of, hail fellows, well met, will degenerate into nothing more than a baby show. The bottle that father carries on the hip will be baby's. Classmate fathers will assemble in eager knots to discuss formulas for infants' food, not hooch. Alumni will perch upon the old college fence to sing lullabies, not college songs. Lively spirits whose escapades have been the delight of their contemporaries will go stumbling through class reunions in the wee sma' hours, but they will only be walking baby to sleep.

"With a bumper crop of prodigies we may well be apprehensive. The class baby of this spring may prove to be a holy terror for perception, memory, and general penetration. At the end of the reunion he may be able to return and give the absent mother practically a stenographic report of everything that took place. 'How daddy did cut up! Mother, you should speak to him! Haven't we a law on prohibition?' That will be baby's line unless we awaken to our deadly danger. Men, resist all impulses to bring your progeny. We ourselves shall park our infant at home. Already he has been taught to chant 'Yale, Yale, you can't play ball!' by his mother, who married us in an unguarded moment when there were no Princeton men handy. Let us resist!"

Meanwhile, down in Mississippi, woman's cause is being strengthened by the senatorial campaign of Miss Belle Kearney, who raises the vital issue between naturalness and the lip stick, the short skirt, cigarettes in the lips of beauty, the permanent wave, bobbed hair and the little round gilt boxes in which lurk the powder pun and the deposit of French or Spanish rouge. Miss Kearney is not debating the tariff nor the Ku Klux Klan. She is saying little or nothing about lynching. On the subject of the League of Nations and whether we should have engaged in the Genoa Conference she is mostly silent. When it comes to the coal strike or the unemployed, she makes a noise like a jack-rabbit trying to attract the attention of a hungry coyote. But when it comes to the powder puff, Belle is there, foot, horse, and guns, her own powder dry, her linstock alight, her shrapnel pounded home and ready to pour into the ranks of the foe. One wonders which will win, and how the great battle is to be decided. Of what would victory for Belle consist; mere election, or the passage of an act putting lip sticks under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission? Then there is that eternal question of naturalness. Is nose powder any less natural than any skirt at all?

The vitality of Newport as the summer colony of society, as well as of Rhode Island, is proving a surprise to those who have been predicting its decline before the social progress of Southampton. The latter town grows stronger and stronger every year with the social set in the East, but Newport seems able thus far to hold its old supremacy; although wide is the conjecture as to how long it may continue to do so. Families sometimes divide between the two, and that makes prediction doubly difficult. This year Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., will probably pass the summer at Southampton, while Muriel and Consuelo visit the dowager Mrs. Vanderbilt at Newport. The Mackays, too, it is said, will remain through the summer at their place at Roslyn, on Long Island. Mrs. Ogden Goelet, on the other hand, will spend the summer at Newport after her return from Europe, and with her will probably come her daughter, the Duchesse of Roxburghe. Of course, if Ochre Court, which belongs to Mrs. Goelet, should be purchased by the British government for a summer embassy, Newport would be fixed in the social system more securely than ever. Long Island could show nothing like that. But the expense of keeping up the old Newport places has become staggering of late, and entertainment tends to lose its brilliancy when overclouded by too many bills. Many great English houses have gone under the hammer since the war and the advent of heavier taxes than the upper English class has ever known. Newport is not exactly forced to imitate England in this particular, but the economical tendency is there. Under present conditions it looks as though Long Island would run Rhode Island a close race very soon.

Eastern beauty experts have begun to concentrate on swimming as an aid to the development of the feminine figure. Certainly it exhibits it to advantage, and should therefore add something to its attractions when displayed. Bathing beauties are not always beautiful; but if the figure alone is to be the deciding consideration, it is now said that swimming will make them so. A great swimmer of Washington, D. C., Miss Peggy Smith of the Russian Bureau of the Department of State, declares that most girls who have had figures are simply lazy—that if they are pudgy or scrawny it is their own fault. They can have beautiful bodies if they will merely swim enough. Like all such advisers she fails to say how much is enough, and the prescription remains like those recipes so exasperating to brides, which tell you to set the cake in the oven or the turnips on the stove and "cook until done." There is likely to be, however, on account of her advice, a good deal more swimming in the vicinity of Washington and Philadelphia than there has been heretofore. The beaches and the bath houses are going to attract a great many persons of both sexes who never used to feel the need of such relaxation. The main trouble with swimming appears to be that while it may improve the figure, it does little for the pulchritude of the human face—and no one cares to swim all winter. A girl who has improved her outlines wonderfully by briny exercises in summer may yet lose in winter to one who has remained indoors or under the automobile top, and preserved her complexion and her wide-eyed stare from the too ardent sun.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Grandma is on the friendliest terms with her chickens and house animals. The other day she said: "That's the most aggravating cat I ever had. When that cat first came here I couldn't understand a word it said."

A former socialist, who is now very anti, is known for his ready wit. Recently he was haranguing an open-air meeting and referred to our boys who fought "over there." A stout suffragette asked him in an acrid tone: "Will you tell us why you didn't fight with the boys 'over there'?" "Yes, madam," answered the ex-socialist, "for the same reason you are not with the Follies—physical disability!"

W. S. Gilbert once granted an interview to an American journalist who said he had heard that Gilbert was interested in stock, and inquired what number of cattle he possessed. "Oh, I have about two thousand head—principally bees," was the rejoinder. The story was widely circulated in this country with the words "principally bees" omitted and replaced by the statement that Mr. Gilbert was going in for ranching.

Two Jews met on a street in a Western town. Said one: "I am all broke up; business is rotten, and I have lost all my money." "How so?" said the friend. "I see your sign still out on the second story of 19 Main Street." "Listen," said the first Jew; "I put in $5000 worth of fixtures, $10,000 new stock, and insured for $30,000. Then the fire-engine company takes the lower floor and a swimming teacher the floor above me. Oi! Oi!"

The secretary of the New England Anti-Tobacco League said in a recent address in Portland, "Carefully compiled statistics show us that for every cigar a man smokes he shortens his life three days, while with every cigarette he shortens his life a week." A physician, prominent in Portland, rose with the question: "Are those statistics absolutely accurate?" "Absolutely, sir," said Secretary Wilson. "Why?" "Because," replied the M. D. caustically, "if they are, I've been dead over three hundred years."

Dorothy was given a new teddy bear whose shoe-button eyes were sewed on so crookedly that bruin wore a tailor-made squint. Dorothy appeared to make no comment on the ocular equipment of her new toy till the following Sunday. She returned from Sunday-school and announced that Teddy's name was "Gladly." "Why, 'Gladly,' dear?" she was asked. "Oh, it must be Gladly," Dorothy insisted, "for in Sunday-school this morning we sang 'Gladly a Cross-Eyed Bear.'"

Augustine Birrell, in his early days at the bar, often had many poor clients. On one occasion the defendant was so poor that Birrell offered to handled his case for nothing. Birrell won the case and the grateful client sent him 15 shillings. In order not to hurt the man's feelings Mr. Birrell accepted the fee, but a fellow-lawyer reproached him for doing so. "Don't you know," said the fellow-lawyer, "that it is unprofessional to take less than gold?" "Well," said Mr. Birrell, seriously, "I took all the poor beggar had. You don't consider that unprofessional, do you?"

Edith Wharton, the writer, told this war story: "The American wounded were being brought in from the second Marne battle," she said, "and a fussy looking woman in a khaki uniform and Sam Browne belt knelt over the stretcher and said, 'Is this an officer, or only a man?' The brawny corporal who stood beside the stretcher gave her a grim laugh and said: 'Well, lady, he aint no officer, but he's been hit twice in the innards, both legs busted, he's got two bullets in both arms, and we dropped him three times without his lettin' out a squeak, so I guess ye can call him a man.'"

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler said on his return from Paris: "Oh, yes, skirts are a little longer now, but if you think the new fashions are really any more modest—well, listen to this story: A young American matron with a mansion in the Faubourg St. Honore called in her French doctor to consult him on the subject of vaccination. 'Of course,' she said. 'I shan't want the mark to show.' 'No, of course not,' said the doctor. 'Well, that will be easily arranged. We'll vaccinate you a little above the knee.' 'Oh, how absurdly old-fashioned!' said the young matron. 'As if that wouldn't show when I go bathing this winter in California. Look here, doctor, isn't there any such thing as internal vaccination?'"

A Scotchman who landed in Canada not long ago accosted a coal black negro for a direction. It happened that the black had been born in the Highland district of Scotland and lived there most of his life. "Hey, mannie," said the Scotchman, "can ye no tall me whaur I'll find the kirk?" The darky pointed with his arm. "Go richt up to yon wee hoose and turn to ye're richt and gang up the hill," said he. The visiting Scotty looked at him in horror. "And arre ye frae Scotland, mon?" he asked. "R-richt ye arre," said the darky. "Aberdeen's ma hame." "And hoo lang have ye been here?" asked the Scotchman breathlessly. "Aboot twa year," said the darky. "Lord save us and preserve us," said the new arrival. "Whaur ken I get the boat for Edinburo?"

Frederick Starr, professor of anthropology at the University of Chicago, disapproves of mnemonic systems. In support of an argument on the subject he once told the following yarn: The wife of a friend told him to look up a certain Mr. Crummock in the city. "Crummock? Oh, I can't remember such a name as that," said the man. "Now, dear, where are you mnemonics?" said his wife. "Mnemonics teach you that to remember a thing you need only to get a rhyme for it. Crummock—stomach! How easy that is! Now you're sure to remember, aren't you?" "I suppose so," the man muttered doubtfully. And repeating, "Crummock, stomach, Crummock, stomach," he strode off to catch his train. That evening when he got home he approached his wife rather guiltily. "I looked hard downtown," he said, "but I couldn't find that man Kelley anywhere."

The universe revealed by science is desperately monotonous. All the suns are drops of fire, all the planets drops of mud.—Anatole France.

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Other Man.

The other man—no matter where
We go, we always find him there—
Accoutered to the nth degree
Of haberdash propriety.
And always he has something on
That starts my wife to saying, "John,
If YOU would just pick out a hat
That looked as well on you as THAT!"
Perhaps it is a tie he's got,
That jolts her trigger with a "What
A stunning scarf! Oh, John—if YOU Could just find something like that too!"
The other man! He always knows
Just how to wear his snappy clothes;
So wonderfully—in him's revealed
The Brummel and the Chesterfield.
In theatre or church or club,
Upon the El—on surface, Sub,
Serenely bobbing up I see
The other man confronting me;
That ultimate perfected soul—
Thorn of my rankled journey's goal.
But hold! Through all the gloom of night,
Methinks I see a ray of light!
Who knows—when I am dressed
And dolled up in my humble best,
Perhaps this same resplendent I
To some still more unlucky guy
Am pointed out by good friend wife
To be the thorn in his poor life!
—Anthony Euwer in Judge.

Steel Shafted Golf Clubs.

The United States Golf Association recently barred the steel shaft, but in official circles it is understood that this decision may be reconsidered. The Western Golf Association recently held a field test of the new steel-shafted golf club. The experiments were made by Bob MacDonald and Allan Gow, Chicago professionals, and Chick Evans, former amateur and open champion. Each player drove six balls with steel-shafted clubs and six with hickory-shafted clubs. The executive committee of the Western Golf Association on the following day announced that its investigations and tests showed that steel-shafted golf clubs give no mechanical advantage to players and their use would be permitted in tournaments conducted by this association. Golf club manufacturers admit that the hickory supply is very low and growing scarcer each year.

The stranger laid down four aces and scooped in the pot. "This game isn't on the level," protested Sagebrush Sam, producing a gun to lend force to his accusation. "That aint the hand I dealt you."—Lippincott's Magazine.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

Social Notes.

Mrs. Mabel Cluff Wilson and Mr. C. Arthur Comstock were married on Saturday, May 25th, at Mrs. Wilson's Washington Street home. The wedding was a quiet one, only the most intimate friends and relatives of Mrs. Wilson and Mr. Comstock attending. Mr. Hubert Litchfield came from New York for the wedding, and was best man for Mr. Comstock. Rev. William Kirk Guthrie officiated. Mrs. C. A. Comstock, mother of Mr. Comstock, and her granddaughter, Miss Harriet Simmons, came from New York to be present at the ceremony. After a wedding tour of a month or so in California, Mr. and Mrs. Comstock will spend the remainder of the summer in the Adirondacks.

Miss Dorothy Gebhardt, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles G. Gebhardt, and Mr. James J. Fagan, Jr., were married on Wednesday at an Episcopal rectory at Sacramento. The marriage was a surprise to friends of Mr. and Mrs. Fagan, although their engagement had been announced some months ago. Mr. Fagan is the son of Mr. and Mrs. James Fagan and the brother of Miss Doris Fagan and Mr. Paul I. Fagan and Mr. Harold Fagan. Mr. and Mrs. Fagan are on a motor trip, and on their return from their wedding tour will make their home in San Francisco.

The wedding of Miss Roberta Hellman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Hellman, and Mr. Lounsbury Fish will be celebrated on Thursday evening, June 8th, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Hellman at Palo Alto. Miss Hellman has chosen her sister, Miss Louise Hellman, as her maid of honor, and Miss Frances Fish, Miss Edith Spinney, Miss Helen Clunie, and Miss Nancy Hellman as bridesmaids. Mr. Guido Marx will be best man for Mr. Fish.

Cards for the wedding of Miss Berenice Mitchell and Mr. Donald Garton Keyston have been sent out. The ceremony will take place on the evening of June 10th at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Mitchell, on Clay Street. Miss Mitchell will have as her attendants Miss Sallie Obeas as maid of honor, Mrs. Otto Grau as matron of honor, Miss Marian Mitchell, Miss Annette Rolph, Miss Helen Breck, and Miss Leonore Morrissey as bridesmaids. Mr. Otto Grau will act as best man for Mr. Keyston.

On account of the serious illness of Miss Hooper's mother, Mrs. Clara B. Hooper, the wedding of Miss Hélène Cooper and Mr. Charles E. Street, Jr., was celebrated very quietly on Saturday, May 20th.

Miss Helen St. Goar and Lieutenant-Commander Ernest Gunther, U. S. N., were quietly married on Saturday, May 20th, at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Henry St. Goar, on California Street. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Jennings of St. Luke's Church in the presence of only immediate friends and relatives. The bridal attendants were Mrs. Hubert Mee, sister of Miss St. Goar, and Mrs. Frederick St. Goar. Commander Fitzhugh Green was best man. Lieutenant and Mrs. Gunther will make their home in San Francisco on their return from their wedding tour. They have taken a house on Vallejo Street.

Dr. and Mrs. J. Wilson Shiels entertained on Friday evening in honor of their daughter, Miss Jean Shiels, and her fiancé, Mr. Sherman Hoelscher, son of Mr. and Mrs. William Hoelscher. The affair was a musicale and reception given at the Bohemian Club. Mr. Uda Waldrop and Mr. Charles Bulotti, artist members of the Bohemian Club, arranged an impromptu programme. Dancing and bridge filled several hours.

At her home in Burlingame on Friday afternoon Mrs. Grace Russell Hutton was hostess at a luncheon and bridge. Her guests were Mrs. Sydney Cloman, Mrs. Clifford Weatherwax, Mrs. Robert Hays Smith, Mrs. Ross Ambler Curran, Mrs. J. Frank Judge, Mrs. Walter D. Filer, Mrs. Lawrence McCreery, Mrs. Walker Salisbury, Mrs. Thomas Eastland, Mrs. Rennie P. Schwerin, Mrs. Max Rothschild, Mrs. Frederick Cowan, Mrs. Ernest Folger, Mrs. Richard McCreery, Mrs. Arthur Hill Vincent, and Mrs. Mountford Wilson.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Judge were dinner hosts on Saturday evening, entertaining a group of friends at their Burlingame home.

Mrs. Daniel C. Jackling gave an outing party, taking her guests down to her Woodside home on Thursday. The party was in honor of Mrs. C. Arthur Comstock, formerly Mrs. Mabel Cluff Wilson.

General Charles Morton, commanding officer at Fort Mason, was host at a large reception given the other evening at his home in the post. General Morton was assisted in receiving by Colonel Lucien Holbrook, Captain H. A. Brickley, Mrs. Chase Kennedy, Mrs. Robert Noble, and Mrs. Florence Porter Pfingst. Presiding at the tea-table were Mrs. James H. Bull, Mrs. Euclid Frick, Mrs. Fred Griffith, Mrs. Kenyon Joyce, Mrs. Frank Cheatham, Mrs. William Tobin, and Mrs. Gouverneur Packer. Among those who were present at the affair were Mr. and Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Bourn, Mr. and Mrs. Laurance Scott, Mr. and Mrs. R. P. Schwerin, Mr. and Mrs. George Pope, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Drum, Mr. and Mrs. Ross Ambler Curran, Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Martin, Mr. and Mrs. Richard McCreery, Admiral and Mrs. Charles Gove, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Kingsbury, General and Mrs. Hunter Liggett, Mayor and Mrs. James Rolph, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Daniel C. Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Welch entertained on Sunday at luncheon at their Burlingame home in honor of Admiral and Mrs. William Fullam, parents of the hostess. Colonel and Mrs. Sydney Cloman, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Drum, Mr. and Mrs. George Newhall, and Captain Powers Symington were Mr. and Mrs. Welch's guests.

Several luncheon parties preceded the horse races at the C. W. Clark polo field in San Mateo on Sunday. Among those who entertained were Mrs. George Pope, Mrs. Richard McCreery, Mrs. Robert Hays Smith, and Mrs. Fentriss Hill.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Lilley celebrated their wedding anniversary with an outdoor party on Saturday evening. The affair took place in Marin County, many guests from San Francisco going over.

CURRENT VERSE.

"She Is the Grace of All That Are"

She is the grace of all that are.
The fragrant of morn,
The wild, blithe ring, afar, afar,
Of Dian's horn.

She is the hidden carol in
The fringe of the wood,
The sudden blue when clouds wax thin,
The joy of good.

May God who wrought our fleeting race
Forbid her fatal star,
Remembering she is the grace
Of all that are.

—Katharine Lee Bates in "Yellow Clover."

Let Me Confess.

Let me confess, before I die,
I sing for gold enough to buy
A little house with leafy eaves
That open to the Southern skies;

Where I, in peace from human strife,
Will wish no Lazarus brought to life.
Around my garden I will see
More wild flowers than are known to me;

With those white hops, whose children are Big, heavy casks of ale and beer;
And little apples, from whose womb
Barrels of lusty cider come.

Good food, and ale that's strong in brew,
And wine, I'll have; clear water, too,
From a deep well, where it doth lie
Shining as small as my own eye.

And any friend may come to share
What comfort I am keeping there;
For though my sins are many, one
Shall not be mine, when my life's done:
A fortune saved by one that's dead,
Who saw his fellows starve for bread.

—William Henry Davies in "The Captive Lion."

Sally.

If I were a stately sailboat,
I'd sail to Zanzibar,
I'd sail the seven secret seas,
Where the secret cities are,
And some day I'd be sailing with the wind before
My prow.

And all the mermaids of the sea would clamber
Up the bow.
They'd beckon me with laughter,
They'd beckon me with smiles,
They'd show me cakes and candies
In half a dozen styles,

They'd promise me a life of ease
Eating sweets beneath the seas,
They'd promise me a life of play—
A never-ending holiday;
But I would say quite plainly,
And, oh, how stern I'd look!
Do you think that you can tempt me
While Sally is our cook?

If I were a little fire balloon
I'd float aloft to Mars,
I'd pay a call on Venus
And chatter with the stars,
And just as I'd be fluttering across the yellow moon,
The angels would come singing a solemn Sunday tune.

They'd beckon to me gravely,
They'd tell me I could stay,
They'd show me all the jewels
That pave the Milky Way.
They'd promise me a golden crown
And silver robes like eider-down,
They'd give me harps with shining strings
And wonderfully fluffy wings;
BUT—I would tell them plainly
I didn't want to die—
Till all the angel cooks had learned How Sally makes mince pie!

—John Farrar in "Songs for Parents."

Howard Edwards Huntington.

Sometimes you see a tree,
That somehow brings the tears.
Perhaps because its trunk is straighter
Than its fellows—
Perhaps because its head is held more Heavenward,
Or its leaves are greener.

Sometimes you see a flower,
A very lovely flower,
That draws you to it
By all its grace of gentle line,
And color.

Sometimes you meet a man,
Who stands apart from all the others—
With simple faith, and honor clear,
And mind unsullied by the world,
And, best of all,
With kindly feeling towards his fellow-men.
And then you pray, and thank your God
That He has let him move among us.

—Florence Green Birby.

Algebra is an Italian word derived from the Arabic al-jabr, meaning the reunion of broken parts. It was in early use in the sense of bone-setting.

Death of William C. Edes.

Mr. William C. Edes, former chairman and chief engineer of the Alaskan Engineering Commission, died from a heart attack on Thursday, May 25th, on the train between Merced and Modesto, while returning to San Francisco. Mr. Edes, who was sixty-five years of age, has long been known throughout the United States as one of the leading railroad engineers of the country. He came to California in the early '80s, and was associated with William Hood, chief engineer of the Southern Pacific Railroad, in the location of that company's line from New Orleans to San Francisco. In 1907, when the organization of the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company was affected, Mr. Edes was appointed chief engineer. He located and constructed the Northwestern Pacific extension through the Eel River cañon to Eureka.

At Del Monte.

Sir Auckland Geddes, British Ambassador to the United States, has purchased a canvas by Evelyn McCormick, a California painter. Sir Auckland visited the Del Monte Art Gallery during a recent stay at Hotel Del Monte, and was very much impressed by the works of California painters. The canvas of Evelyn McCormick which attracted him shows a historic adobe of Spanish times which was the home of Robert Louis Stevenson during his Monterey sojourn. It was in this home that he wrote his now famous letters.

Interest will be added to the activities at Del Monte and on the historic Monterey Peninsula this summer through the establishment of the Officers' Reserve Training Camp at the Del Monte polo fields. There will be upwards of one thousand officers in training, and a number of social festivities will be staged at the Hotel Del Monte and at the homes on Monterey Peninsula in connection with the camp. The camp is to open the middle of July, and will last until the latter part of August.

The California Girls' Swimming Carnival in the Roman plunge at Del Monte on June 23d to 25th will be made the occasion for the gathering of a crowd.

Miss Katherine Ramsey has been spending a great deal of time on the picturesque bridal trails through the Del Monte forest and along the beach while paying a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Hill Vincent at their Pebble Beach home.

William W. Crocker has taken up polo enthusiastically during his week-end visits to his home at Pebble Beach. Mr. Crocker is showing much form in the saddle and will likely be a figure in some polo matches that will be staged at Del Monte this summer. Lawrence McCreery and Richard Schwerin are two other young poloists who are to participate in a number of tilts at Del Monte with Hugh Drury and Eric Pedley, two of the Del Monte team.

The marriage of Miss Frances Turner and Mark Daniels has created quite a bit of interest on the peninsula. Miss Turner is a student artist and is well known as an expert golf player. She has been making her home with her parents in Carmel for the past year and prior to that time was well known in social circles of Butte, Montana. Mr. Daniels is a landscape artist of national reputation. After a honeymoon trip to Yosemite Mr. and Mrs. Daniels will make their home at Pebble Beach.

Mr. and Mrs. Peter Clark McFarlane are planning to spend the summer at their place on the sand dunes near Asilomar.

Mrs. Lula Wightman is having a beautiful redwood bungalow constructed at Pebble Beach. She has been a guest at the home of Gouverneur Morris at Pacific Grove.

Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Griffith of Fresno have been making a visit to Del Monte for the past fortnight. They are planning to return to spend the summer on the Monterey Peninsula.

Mr. Thomas J. Coleman of San Francisco was entertained at a dinner in the Palm Grill at Del Monte. Among those attending were Mr. and Mrs. Francis McComas and Carl S. Stanley.

The Americans are a hardly race. Despite the earnest efforts of gunmen and automobilists and literary critics and after-dinner speakers and jilted women, they keep on increasing.—Life Lines.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Government Inspector—How many people work here? Employer—Precious few of them.—Punch.

"How much was dose collars?" "Two for a quarter." "How much for vun?" "Fifteen cents." "Giff me de odder vun."—Yale Record.

Orator—What can I do, comrades, to find work for my fellow-creatures? Voice from the Back—Get your hair cut!—London Passing Show.

Literary Man (at the ball)—Are you familiar with John Masfield? Lowbrow Flapper—What d'you mean? I'm never familiar with any one.—Yale Record.

Dauber—Yes, this is my latest picture, and I'll tell you ten thousand would not buy it. Blunt—That's so, and I'm one of the ten thousand.—Toronto Telegram.

Peck—The after-dinner nap is my favorite hour of the entire Sunday. Heck—I thought you never slept after dinner. Peck—I don't, but my wife does.—Boston Transcript.

"Some day you'll be rich enough to retire from business." "Give up my nice pleasant office and stay home?" rejoined Mr. Growcher. "I should say not!"—Washington Star.

"Have you had much experience in a jazz orchestra?" "Have I? Why, five years ago I was a physical weakling!" "Well?" "Feel my muscle now."—London Passing Show.

Doctor—And if he loses consciousness again, give him a teaspoonful of that brandy. Patient's Wife—While he is unconscious, doctor? He'd never forgive me!—Life.

The Vicar—Well, did you win the match? The Captain—No, sir; we lost. The Vicar—And what have you in that sack? The Captain—The referee.—London Passing Show.

Mistress—But why did you leave your last place? Cook—Cos the master used to have such rows with the missus. Mistress—What did they quarrel about? Cook—The way the meals was cooked.—London Mail.

Hostess—So you had a good holiday. Where did you go? Guest—Well, we planned a splendid trip—Paris, Cannes, Florence, Rome, Cairo, and back through Constantinople, Vienna, and down the Rhine, home. But we had to modify it a little. You see, my wife jibbed at the Channel crossing.—Punch.

"But, papa, why take my debts so tragically? I assure you, by hard work, strict economy, and the utmost self-denial you will succeed in clearing them off."—Munich Simplicissimus.

"I have a new play for you; the scene is laid in a dormitory." "Sorry, but we're full up." "But you don't understand—this gives you the chance to use 500 beds." "My boy, name your figure."—Judge.

Old Gentleman's Wife (getting unassisted into her carriage)—You are not so gallant, John, as when you were a boy. Old Gentleman—No, and you aint so buoyant, Mary, as when you were a gal.—Going Around.

"And why should I help you?" demanded the Boston citizen. "Sir," replied the Boston tramp, "I can offer you no coherent reason. Your motives must be altruistic." This got him a dime.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Mrs. Green—And whom does this statue represent? Mrs. Brown—That is Psyche, executed in terra cotta. Mrs. Green—Oh, the poor thing! How barbarous they are in those South American countries!—The Lutheran.

Aunt—Doris, do stop sprawling about the floor and behave properly. Don't you want to grow into the kind of a girl other people look up to? Modern Child—I want to be the kind of girl other people look round at.—London Weekly Telegraph.

Train Boy—Where on the map is Pickwick, Bill? Brakeman—Sounds as if it might be somewhere in the hinterland, kid. Why? Train Boy—Some people are always trying to boost their native town. An old-fashioned hick asked me if I had the Pickwick papers.—Judge.

"That young man stays to an unearthly hour every night, Gladys," said an irate father to his youngest daughter. "What does your mother say about it?" "Well, dad," Gladys replied, as she turned to go upstairs, "she says that men haven't changed a bit."—Everybody's Magazine.

The Big Wheel Falls.

The "Grand Roue"—Big Wheel—or "Farris Wheel," as Americans know it, is no more a part of the Paris skyline, according to the New York Tribune.

The big wheel of Paris which has stood in the Champ de Mars for more than twenty-two years, sharing attention with the Eiffel Tower as one of the lofty sights of the French capital, was condemned in November, 1920, as unsafe and the work of demolition started. Before long, engineers found that tearing down the big circle was a greater engineering task than the erection of it in 1900 as one of the wonders of the Paris Exposition.

The cars were first detached and sent to the devastated regions for homeless families. Next came the very dangerous operation of detaching great girders of steel weighing tons, and lowering them to the ground. As the structure had been erected with a comparatively delicate balance, it became impossible to continue the demolition except by intricate mathematical precision, which might be termed "finding the balance." Flylike workmen, therefore, ascended with paraphernalia to cut off several thousand pounds here and several hundred pounds there, according to the instruction of experts. Little by little Paris has watched the great "roue" disappear. The sons and daughters of hundreds of thousands of American tourists who have already marveled at or "gone up" on the big wheel will now find a more sombre Paris skyline than their fathers and mothers found.

The question is now, How many years before the Eiffel Tower, rising nearly 1000 feet, will be found unsafe and condemned to destruction?

M. Eiffel, the famous engineer who constructed the lofty pile of structural steel, lived to see it perform valuable service during the war as an observation station and wireless post. He is still living today to announce that it is almost as sound and safe as the day it was completed and with proper repair from time to time, will continue so for decades.

The Eiffel Tower—like the Woolworth Tower—pays its way by admission charged visitors. Elevators are constantly climbing to the top with an average of 1000 persons daily. To see Paris lying at his feet costs the tourist 5 francs.

According to the Department of the Interior the potential water-power of the United States is about 60,000,000 horse-power, of which 10,000,000 has been developed. The potential water-power of California is 8,000,000, of which about 12½ per cent. has either been developed or is in process of development.

The Nipponese have taken to modern American dances like ducks to water, and jazz is the order everywhere in the Mikado's empire.

What Political Meddling Gets Us.

Here we have all those enterprises that are engaged in rendering what are called "public services": railroads, street railways, electric light and power companies, gas companies, etc. The courts held that because of their monopolistic or quasi-monopolistic nature they might charge the public excessive rates and make exorbitant profits, and that therefore they were subject to the regulation of their charges. On this foundation we have built a system of regulation which has made public service concerns, and especially railway and traction companies, the Ishmaels of the business world, says Samuel O. Dunn in the North American Review. We jumped to the utterly fallacious conclusion that the only way to make sure their rates always would be reasonable was to restrict their net returns as much as the courts would allow. It was decided that in order adequately to control their net returns, they must be prevented from issuing any securities except those representing actual investment. Knowing that in many instances the outstanding securities do not represent actual investment, we have developed elaborate engineering and accounting methods of evaluating their physical properties; and we exhaust our ingenuity in devising means of so regulating their rates as to keep their net returns on these valuations just as low as the courts will not hold confiscatory. . . .

What does all this mean? It means that as a result of the legally sound, but economically unsound, distinction that we make between concerns which do and concerns which do not render a public service, we are directly encouraging the development of many industries which are highly desirable but relatively non-essential, and directly discouraging the development of industries which are absolutely essential. As a matter of public policy—to state the facts in their baldest form—we are encouraging the manufacture of chewing gum and discouraging the provision of electric lights and power. As a matter of public policy we are encouraging the manufacture of cosmetics and silk shirts and discouraging the provision of good and adequate street railway service. As a matter of public policy we are encouraging the increase of "movie" shows and discouraging and actually making impossible the adequate development of railways.

Among barred subjects at the Elizabethan court were references to the queen's age or marriage. Any one so intrepid or foolish as to venture on these taboo grounds was not likely to do so a second time, if he valued his place at court. Elizabeth's temper has been a matter of general knowledge. If her beer was not to her liking she flew into violent tantrums. Her courtiers wisely kept her in good humor by losing money to her at cards and by making her expensive presents. Mrs. Montague presented the queen with her first pair of silk stockings, made by herself, and told Elizabeth that she would make her more. "Do so," quoth the queen, "for indeed I like silk stockings so well because they are pleasant, fine, and delicate. Henceforth I will wear no more cloth stockings." Her vanity was unappeasable. As she grew old she ordered all mirrors banished from the palace. Twenty years later, when she was dying, she sent for a mirror and saw herself a "lean, haggard, wrinkled old woman." Her flatterers were then duly rewarded by a bitter berating for having assured her that her youthful charms had endured.

They Will Be Very Welcome.

Preparations for the entertainment of the Shriners are going forward with creditable smoothness, and would appear to indicate that the reception committee is expecting some of the most robust and stalwart citizens on June 11th that ever tore a town to tatters. Any Shriner that can take the whole course and live through it should enter for the next Olympiad, for he will outdo all competitors. There is to be dancing every night at the Auditorium, and for three nights at the Winter Garden and Arcadia halls. There will be an old-fashioned minstrel show, which can be taken sitting. There will be special automobile races at San Carlos on June 14th. For those that find things irksome, or the parade routes too short and lacking in opportunity for fresh air and exercise, there will be trap-shooting at Lakeside. Then there are yacht races and regattas for those that are hard to suit ashore, and there will be life-saving exhibitions by the Coast Guard in the surf by the Esplanade. Swimming races are on the programme for Sutro Baths and the beach. No doubt golf could be added, and a few "human fly" stunts if any Shriner has enough energy left either to participate or merely go and look. In addition, the Shriners are to be thrilled and uplifted by means of radio concerts everywhere, this form of edification having been improved until it is about as effective as the phonograph. It is expected that the crest of the human flood will reach

San Francisco on June 11th or 12th, and that in those two days the nobles of sixty-one temples will arrive. They will have a warm welcome. San Francisco hospitality is known the world around, and it is of the distinctly strenuous brand. It does not sit on the front porch cooling itself with a palm-leaf fan, but distributes its favors and its smiles over the truly wonderful landscapes of the vicinity. No doubt any Shriner who felt any coolness whatever in the various forms of welcome extended would be permitted and even encouraged to restore his circulation by wandering up to the top of Tamalpais. They are among the best fellows on earth, and all roads are open to them.

Labor Union Responsibility.

Another Supreme Court decision issues to inflame the wrath of those that believe in special privileges for labor leaders, and reassure those that believe in government of law with special privilege to none. The court holds in the Coronado coal mine case that labor organizations, even if unincorporated, are amenable to the provisions of the Sherman anti-trust act against restricting interstate commerce, and that they may be sued for damages, and prosecuted for violations of the law, just like anybody else. "Funds accumulated to be expended in conducting strikes are subject to action in suits for torts committed by such unions in strikes." Authority to order a strike, placed by members of a local union in its leaders, makes the district organization responsible for unlawful injuries inflicted during the strike, and the strike fund is liable for any judgment recovered. At the same time, the court held that in this case it had not been proved that the strike and its accompanying violence were intended as a restraint of interstate commerce, and hence the damages previously awarded are set aside. If the court has been too amiable it is at this point.

We have had in this country a lot of labor leaders who have assumed the special privileges of viscounts and royal dukes in feudal times. They have called their contests war, and claimed from public sympathy immunity for a line of conduct that no system of jurisprudence worthy the name can concede to anybody, for any purpose, except in real warfare against a foreign enemy. Such private warfare is going on in this city today. Within the week a taxicab was fired on in a San Francisco downtown street and a passenger narrowly escaped death, because the cab was driven by a non-union man. In Chicago, violence has been more general than that. Sentimentalists and sob sisters whose great hearts yearn for the poor and who wish to elevate their sad estate look with tolerance on a condition from which all society is suffering; and from whose continuance and evil growth the poor ultimately would suffer more than any other class. If anybody needs the protection of an equal and reliable administration of justice, all the time, it is the weak and the submerged. They never got any help from privileged persons, either labor leaders of the lawless variety, or royal dukes who held license to commit murder and arson at will. Much help they can get from legal and responsible organization, using the methods of collective bargaining, and the peaceful strike when that fails. But privileged violence is an intolerable thing.

Murder was not an issue in this case, but responsibility was. The decision is notice to labor everywhere that it can claim no privileges not enjoyed by the rest of us. It can not destroy some one else's property on the ground that a strike has been called, and that a strike is war, without paying for what it breaks. Certain of its leaders have claimed immunity from the law that governs us all. They may not have it. There is and shall be one law for the poor and the rich. Into the technical refinements of the case it is not possible to go at this time. Enough is known of it, however, to make it certain that no dictator claiming the right to carry on private war in labor's name is going to like it. No soap-box orator will like it, and no sidewalk audience sympathetic with the view that crime should enjoy immunity when it is committed in the interest or the supposed interest of labor is going to like it. And such persons will like it still less for its manifest fairness in holding that the intent to restrain interstate trade was not proved. But it will have many friends because of its many enemies, and unless the United States has gone insane the friends will outnumber the enemies three to one.

Now let the labor unions generally incorporate, having lost the main advantage of non-incorporation, and let them make their struggles for better conditions as the rest of us must—within the law.

Culture and the University.

The Argonaut publishes this week a letter from Professor Gilbert N. Lewis, of the faculty of the University of California, confirming some of the gravest of the criticisms offered in these columns on the general conduct of affairs at Berkeley within recent years. Professor Lewis does not unreservedly commend the Argonaut, just as the Argonaut does not unreservedly censure the institution. No two persons could possibly take exactly the same view of a matter so broad and intricate. Yet Professor Lewis understands that in the main this publication has been right; and to be in the main right is all that is given any of us.

What is amiss at Berkeley—and very much is amiss—is owing to the fact that there has been engrafted upon the curriculum many things tending, not to promote the purposes for which the university was founded and for which, theoretically, it is sustained, but calculated to subordinate and ultimately to defeat those purposes. A state university should be primarily a school of the higher culture. What justifies the legislature and satisfies the taxpayers in spending money for its development is the expectation that it will contribute to the intellectual enrichment of life, and at the same time make more effective citizens of the youth sent there—that it will turn out men and women of the depth of understanding and stability of character necessary for their work in the world, for the operation of representative government, and for the support of the best social tendencies; voters that can not be befooled and befuddled by the demagogue, the visionary, or the fanatic. To a great extent this has been achieved. The electorate of California is an intelligent and a moral one, and from time to time it produces leadership of excellence, leadership whose selection has not been the blind choice of ignorance, but the preference of people whose standards are high and who are capable of using them for the measurement of those upon whose shoulders the burdens of leadership shall fall. To assist in developing such an electorate is a lofty calling. With all due respect, we express the opinion that the pulpit can not do so much for human welfare as well-conducted universities; from which, in fact, the pulpit itself must draw most of its men of character and inspiration. And not only the pulpit, but the press, and not only the press, but the bench and the bar and commercial life, and every form of art through which life seeks to express itself and grow—all must look to the university as the repository of standards and the source of ideals.

It is for these reasons that the Argonaut has been jealous of the fame and the character of the University of California, and has sought to suggest correctives of tendencies that it is convinced are growing destructive—so increasingly destructive as to have led to the resignation of an apparently well-qualified president. In this the Argonaut has been actuated by a desire to help reconstruct and restore; not to demolish. Berkeley must not be permitted to degenerate. She means too much in the life of California, and of the nation. She supplies the leaven of the state. Not all can avail themselves of the advantages she offers; but those that can, and do, help in a thousand invisible ways to elevate the standards of the rest. When the intelligence tests of more than 1,700,000 officers and enlisted men of the recently drafted army revealed 12 per cent. of an exceptional order of intelligence, that 12 per cent. was distributed throughout the organization, so that the morale of every company was raised. That has heretofore been the function in civil life of the University of California—and of its great colleague institution at Palo Alto.

When the state university concentrated its efforts on the teaching of essentials and the substantial things of the spirit and the mind, it did produce men and women of distinction and character. There is scant reason to believe that a continuation of so proud a record is to be the outcome of the sort of merry-go-round and acrobatic vaudeville toward which the institution is tending. The university at Berkeley has yielded to the popularizing drift of all political institutions, and, to change the figure, has become a sort of cafeteria where young people can load their own trays with pastries and meringues instead of the meats of culture. It has grown, in the phrase of Professor Lewis, bigger instead of greater. It now asks for an appropriation of nine million dollars for the next biennial period—a riotous expenditure of public money; not a dishonest one, but a diversion of much wealth of the state to objects which will be in large part ornamental rather than useful, and in some part neither ornamental nor useful, but distinctly vulgar, and, in trend, lowering to standards of modesty and delicacy, of manners and of taste. Such tendencies do not characterize the whole curriculum; and much of the best remains. But they do tend to debase the whole curriculum. They are not yet of the core and centre of the university life. But they have got a foothold, they are growing, and they threaten to overwhelm all the rest. Sometimes they have been given a place for publicity purposes, and the sort of scholarly ideal they promote and of publicity they produce is illustrated by the picture printed in this number of the Argonaut, a picture taken, not from the Police Gazette, but from a reputable newspaper and from a number issued within the fortnight. Pupils that have fallen behind in their studies, and thereby demonstrated that the best advantages of the institution have been wasted on them, are permitted to make up credits leading to a degree by studying swimming and "dancing." We venture the opinion that the sort of dancing here depicted would hardly—if at all—be tolerated at the Winter Garden or the Arcadia dance hall.

Evidently what is needed at Berkeley is a contraction and not an expansion of activities and expenditures, and a thorough-going, honest effort to get back to a basis of scholarship—which does not mean swimming, dancing in the chemise, and other physical exercises. There should be a determination on the part of faculty and regents to hold fast to the essentials and cut off all the rest—cut ruthlessly back to the sound wood of the tree. The thousand instructors should be reduced one-half, and the attendance should be restricted by matriculation examinations which would eliminate those unfit to appreciate and profit by the institution's benefits in favor of those qualified by diligence and character and legitimacy of aim and purpose to approximate and then maintain its standards. There should be a restoration of class lines, year by year—lines which once meant much for discipline and order and comparison of accomplishment, but whose tendency to disappear is one of the symptoms of a general confusion as to what a college course really means. Examinations for promotions from year to year should be sufficiently rigorous to eliminate the laggards and all whose life interests may have changed to something less scholarly during their terms of work. Requirements should be raised to a level that would exclude the frivolous and trifling of both sexes, as persons not qualified to make worthy use of education should they accidentally absorb any. This would probably cut down the attendance by 30 per cent. and give the rest a chance at better instruction. It might even do something toward restoring the old, inspiring personal contacts of student and professor that existed when the university was young. And, most important of all, a president should be chosen who can be trusted to carry out such policies, no matter what individuals are hurt by them, and in the face of whatever zation. No farmer shipping his produce over the Southern Pacific, or the Central Pacific, and no organization of farmers, has for a long time been forced to think whether the shipment was going to travel by one road or the other. The policy of the roads under Hariman has been to build up California and the West. It has been an intelligent policy that has in large part adjusted old grievances and eliminated complaints. No one was asking at the time this decision issued to have these roads unmerged. The sentiment of thirty years ago had radically changed, and the feeling toward the railroads, throughout the state, has been during late years of a generally friendly character—the best evidence of the service rendered by the roads to the real interests of the public. If the roads are to be un-scrambled now, it will mean endless confusion, duplication of arrangements, and the added delay, turmoil, and expense of building up an almost new organization for the Central Pacific—to say nothing of the chaos in routing and billing that will ensue, and possibly the new construction that will be made necessary to give terminals to bits of line now beginning at small shipping points and running to stations on the other road. Such instances have become numerous in the course of economical construction planned on the supposition that the two roads were, and were to remain, an administrative unit. It should be needless to remark that the added costs of construction, administration, and doubling of organization would fall as a burden on the shippers of California. It would dislocate physical and financial arrangements, both of the roads and the public. And all this confusion and waste would flow from an old effort, too strictly interpreted, to secure to the public that vague and unreal blessing known as competition: a means elevated to the importance of an end, a thing often impotent to secure good service and whose benefits are therefore often a myth.

In fact, in the case of the Sherman act the court has been divided, a strong minority feeling that it was only designed to prevent restraint of trade and was stretched too far when interpreted to prevent restraint of competition; which is not at all the same thing as trade, nor even necessary to it. State monopolies are infamous. Monopolies that grow naturally out of free competitive conditions often render the maximum of service to the public. And that is what California has enjoyed under the unit arrangement between the Southern and Central Pacific systems. It is to be hoped that some way shall be found to prevent the tearing asunder of these beneficently joined elements and the scattering into fragments of the greatest transportation system in the world. A large part of California's present prosperity depends upon it.

Needless Taxes.

The endeavor to hold down the municipal budget is meeting with the usual resistance from the embattled improvers who wish every new fad in city development supplied at the general expense, forgetting that no matter what attractions you add to a city, all will be overcome by the repulsion of an exorbitant tax rate. It is all very well to invite new residents to share the benefits of city life; but those persons worth having as new residents are the sort of people that know they are also being invited to share our tax burden, and if we are foolish enough to make that burden too heavy they simply will not come. In these troublous and expensive times the budget should contain nothing that can be dispensed with. A good example of swelling the tax rate for the unnecessary is the item of a stadium to be built opposite the Polytechnic High School. That would be a nice thing to have, but it is not necessary,

A PHASE OF THE HIGHER CULTURE AT BERKELEY.

Oakland Tribune

OAKLAND, CALIFORNIA, TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 30, 1922.

Dance and Be Beautiful Is Berkeley Theory

antagonisms they may arouse, either in the faculty, the board of regents, or the legislature. Berkeley is too proud and fine an institution to be permitted to drift on any wavering currents of the merely popular and political.

Unmerging a Unit.

It is well within the facts to say that the recent decision of the Supreme Court under which, if it is to stand, the Central and the Southern Pacific railroads would have to be unmerged, has caused consternation in California, to whose prosperity such an unmerging would be a staggering blow. The late news that a rehearing is to be granted will come as a ray of hope to a people menaced by what would be no less than a calamity.

The service rendered the industry of this state and the whole Pacific Coast by the railroads is valuable beyond all ordinary comprehension, and it has been made possible in its present effective form in this region by the unit operation of the Southern and the Central Pacific. Under this arrangement, which has prevailed for so many years that Californians today seldom think of them as separate, or, in fact, seldom think at all of the Central Pacific except historically, there has grown up a condition of economical administration which has in large part dispensed with duplicate administrative services and has concentrated functions in one organiand so Supervisor McSheehy was clearly in the right when he tried, in vain, to have it stricken from the list. A stadium is dispensable. Some of our greatest men grew up without one. Samuel Adams, promoter of the revolution, got along as best he could without this elevating influence. Alexander Hamilton, one of the main authors of the Constitution, had no stadium. George Washington, rather important person in his day, escaped the British for a long time without stadium training. Abraham Lincoln never cavorted around a stadium, but took his early exercise in useful work and the Black Hawk war. One of our main fiscal troubles is that we tend to grow confused about the term "necessary." It is far more restricted in meaning, and should be in financial practice, than most persons seem to suppose. All over the land the cities are wasting millions on the unnecessary, and most of the unnecessary projects are paternalistic in character and therefore harmful and morally debilitating to the oncoming generation. That stadium, and everything else in the budget like it, should wait until the tax rate can be reduced to the normal, or a little below it. This is no time for increasing the burdens of the public in any way that can be avoided.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Close View of Berkeley.

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
DEPARTMENT OF CHEMISTRY

BERKELEY, June 2, 1922.

DEAR MR. HOLMAN: Your searching criticism of the University of California in the Argonaut of May 27th contains some remarks concerning the faculty of the university which must be the result of some misapprehension, and which perhaps should be discussed. But how can we who are members of that faculty quarrel with one whose views coincide so nearly with our own, and who has been the first to say some things which are very much in need of being said? Your editorial could not be more opportune. The university is indeed at the parting of the ways, if it has not already taken some timid but irrefragable steps upon the lower of the two roads that lie open before it. Now, if ever, is the time for all friends of higher education in California to help decide what the university is to become.

Your comments centre upon the resignation of Dr. Barrows. Your admiration for his personality is fully shared by the faculty, to which he is returning, and of which he will be, as he has always been, one of the members most universally beloved. As president his attitude toward the faculty has been one of such frankness, good nature, and comradeship that no feeling of personal ill-will is thinkable. On the other hand, the president has felt it is his duty on one or two occasions to act as spokesman for certain policies with which the senate is not in accord, and the issues are the very ones emphasized in your editorial.

According to law, "The senate, subject to the approval of the Board of Regents, shall determine the conditions for admission, for certificates, and for degrees. It shall authorize and supervise all courses of instruction in the academic and professional colleges and schools. It shall recommend to the Board of Regents all candidates for degrees in course." In attempting to fulfill these duties the academic senate has been actuated by an overwhelming desire to raise the standards of admission, of graduation, and of scholarship throughout the curriculum; to eliminate the unfit; to devote the money appropriated by the state to the thorough education of those who are eager and qualified to profit thereby, and to the intensive training of the few who may become leaders in the various activities of the state. The senate does not share the "obsession of numbers," of which it has itself been the chief victim. It regards with dismay the growing incubus of "superfluities and superficialities." We would not deny the usefulness of many of the activities denoted by university extension, but these constantly branching, semi-parasitic growths are threatening to smother the central university. Few realize what a small portion of the university appropriations is devoted to the purposes of fundamental instruction. Nor is money the only consideration. The attention of regents and faculty alike is distracted by countless side issues whose administration has led to the great "overhead" which makes the business management one of the largest factors in the affairs of the university.

It is not easy to fix responsibility for the present trend toward expansion and dissipation. Your editorial hints at "machinations" and states that "there is reason to suspect that individual desire for domination, that ulterior aims more or less secretly maintained, that unworthy jealousies, have more or less had their part in influencing the course—both in acts and neglects—of the regents." It would be idle to deny that during the past five years rumors of this sort have been current. They are distressing to one who knows the number of men of high courage, judgment, and loyalty who are members of the Board of Regents. But as long as these rumors remain unrefuted they are extremely disquieting. To the friends of the university who can not look behind the scenes one alarming fact has become evident. During recent years the university has entered politics and politics have entered the university.

To the difficult problem of the university there is but one adequate solution. The university must publicly announce a clear-cut policy for the future, one which can not be altered by the pressure of interests or of politicians, and which can be approved by all who cherish the highest ideals and ambitions for the University of California. This would permit the executive powers once more to be concentrated into the hands of one man, the president of the university. If this is accomplished, if the president, vested with full executive authority, is also committed to a programme which will permit the university to undertake only those tasks which can be performed with distinction, which will make the university greater rather than bigger, and which will enable the faculty to give better instruction while a higher standard of ability and application is required of the student, that man and that programme would always have the enthusiastic support of a united faculty.

GILBERT N. LEWIS.

From an Alumnus of Berkeley.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 29, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Your article on Berkeley, I feel confident, can not fail to meet with the hearty approval of all thinking right-minded citizens and should help to crystallize a movement which will eventually result in the establishing of a separate women's college and make of the university at Berkeley an institution where only men having serious intentions of obtaining a real university education will be accommodated.

To further its campaign for numbers the university dominates and prescribes the courses for the high schools, not that the pupils will be more or less thoroughly fitted to enter the business world, but that they may be accredited to the university. Following the example of the university, the San Francisco high schools, and I presume high schools throughout the state, allow the children to select their own courses, hours, etc., so as to obtain the minimum credits with the least inconvenience to the children to permit them to enter the university.

They, the high schools, also have to have their paid coaches, who like the university coaches and trainers soon become more important than the directors of the institutions.

I sincerely hope that the Argonaut will continue its kindly and constructive criticism of the university to the end that much-needed reforms will be made.

From an Alumnus and a Farmer.

THE FORD-CRAIG RANCH COMPANY
VOLNEY H. CRAIG, General Manager

FORD RANCH,
SAN FERNANDO, CAL., June 2, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I am an alumnus of Berkeley, and a farmer; we have read and reread your editorial entitled "Berkeley" of your issue of May 27th. We have to confess with humiliation that what you said, to our knowledge, is mostly true. We agree with you in your estimate of Dr. Barrows; we agree with you that a university is not the place to teach the art of growing cabbage or of shoeing horses (the latter, by the way, is becoming a lost art); a university should concern itself, in our estimation, only with teaching the principles that govern the science of agriculture; there is more tommy-rot going through the state on the teaching of agriculture than any one other subject. Immense sums of money are not only being wasted, but are being used to do positive harm.

However, I can not agree with you on two points: First, the blamelessness of Dr. Barrows in the situation in which he finds himself. Dr. Barrows has lived long enough in this wicked world to have learned the frailty of human nature, as exhibited either by college professors or by hired help. A chieftain must rule, whether he runs a great university or a little farm. Dr. Barrows should not have accepted the presidency of the university without insisting that the regents change the rules so that he would rule, and not be obliged to take orders from a bunch of committees of the faculty. It was an impossible situation and he should have known it. Dr. Barrows was wrong in this and he was wrong again when he found the system of government would not work in not going squarely before the Board of Regents and demanding a change, before his resignation. If the regents had refused to accept his demands he could then properly have resigned and the issue would have been clearly drawn.

Second, have you treated the Board of Regents with entire fairness? If the statement that you have made concerning the regents had been made by the blatant yellow press it would not have registered with me at all; but to have it made by the Argonaut has given me a great deal to think about. If what you say in effect, that the control of the Board of Regents is vested in a coterie who have been willing that Dr. Barrows should be subjected to annoyance, because other members of the board have taken their duty indifferently or neglected it altogether, is true, what is to become of California? That you have said it makes me think it is true. I am rather disappointed with your manner of attack; I would have expected the Argonaut to come out openly and say which members of the Board of Regents were to blame, and not to have thrown a bucket of mud covering them all.

VOLNEY H. CRAIG, B. L., 1898.

A Simple Yet Practical Suggestion.

OAKLAND, June 1, 1922.

DEAR HOLMAN: Your article on the university ought to be engraved on a tablet and displayed at the front gate of that institution.

JOHN P. IRISH.

Taxi Rates and Wages.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 1, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In your editorial, "Private War," in the Argonaut for May 13th last you state, "No city owes less to its taxicab companies. Their charges are extortionate, with the result that their business and the service they render is less than half what it should be. Meters show it. The average run of a San Francisco taxicab is about forty miles a day, while in Chicago it is 110 to 120."

Your statement of the low comparative taxicab mileage in San Francisco is absolutely correct, but with your deductions from that comparison I can not agree.

You reason from a cause which you term "extortionate charges" to an effect of extremely low taxicab mileage, while the effect of this low mileage was actually caused by the "minimum day's wage" which the San Francisco taxicab companies have been compelled to pay by the unions.

This it was that caused the strike. The situation is this: For ten years our drivers worked "open shop" and on a straight 20 per cent. commission. They were perfectly satisfied. Then they entered the union and at once the question was raised of substituting a minimum day's wage for their commission. Our drivers didn't want it and voted solidly against it. They were outvoted.

On a minimum day's wage the driver's incentive to increase the business was gone and the taxi business fell off. It was human nature. He got the same if he turned in $10 as if he turned in $20 or more. Our records prove that out of their ten-hour shift the actual work of the drivers is four. The other six they just sit around. As a consequence the drivers cost 12 cents for each taxi mile in San Francisco as against from 4 to 6 cents in Eastern cities, where they work on commission. Although Eastern drivers receive from 6 to 8 cents less a mile, they earn as much as our drivers because of greater mileage.

We wanted to reduce rates, but the union's arbitrary, $5-a-day, minimum wage stood in the way. After negotiation, we offered 25 per cent. commission on all business turned in, with a guaranteed minimum of $4.25. The union representative said they'd take $4.50 without commission.

We didn't want it, as it could not increase the driver's interest in the business, but rather than face a strike we agreed to accept it on condition that the union voted for it first.

The men went out to vote for a $4.50 minimum, as the companies supposed, and voted to strike instead.

From our point of view, to reduce rates and return to the commission basis will be for every one to win. The public will benefit by lower rates, the drivers by a greater return, and the taxi companies by increased business.

The union said, "No. Keep up the rates to the public, and that will cover the $5 minimum wage to the drivers."

In spite of the union we did reduce our rates, and will continue to reduce them as increased patronage shall justify.

Very truly yours,

TAXICAB COMPANY OF CALIFORNIA.

By W. E. TRAVIS, President.

POLITICS AND BUSINESS.

Government Can Not Be Trusted with the Powers Necessary to Commercial Success.

It has evidently been the expectation of those who "believe in the government ownership of public utilities" that the movement toward that form of socialism would be continuous, and the gains cumulative—that the blessings of their panacea would be so great, and so plain to all beholders, that there would be no recession to private ownership, and all the work and trade of the community would finally be carried on by the government instead of the terrible capitalists; as in happy Russia. At any rate, when such recessions to private ownership occur, they never say anything about it. Perhaps they do not learn of such cases; perhaps again they prefer to have the rest of us feel that there are none.

The propagandists for public ownership have been numerous and busy among us for thirty years or more. They have emphasized and pointed with pride to every instance of a city taking over its water supply or its street-car lines, or its electric lighting business. But when a "public utility" is given up as a bad job after some years of political maladministration, little is said about it. Nobody is proud of it, and there are no propagandists to spread the news in lectures and printed articles. The New York Merchants' Association, however, a sane lot of ordinary business men with no motive but to find out which policy, public or private ownership, is the better, has been investigating the public ownership "movement," and its findings are of interest and importance to all California just now, on account of the proposal to have the people mortgage their state for $500,000,000 and give the money to a board of unknown political appointees to go into the business of hydro-electric development and any other business which in their judgment might assist—building railroads, operating copper mines, or manufacturing electrical equipment, for example.

More than 275 cities in this country which had undertaken to conduct their own lighting systems have given it up and turned over their plants to private companies. They found municipal ownership and operation a failure. Advocates of the Water and Power Amendment for California will tell you that is municipal ownership, not state ownership; but it is all state ownership, whether it is by the city, the state, or the nation. The original states were cities. It is all a matter of enterprises being carried on by politicians who do not own them, with money that is not theirs, for salaries which they draw whether their duties are properly discharged and their management is effective or not. There is no essential difference, none worth talking about, between city, state, and government ownership. And when it comes to divorcing the ownership from the operation, there is nothing gained that way that can not be obtained by properly exercised control of rates and services. On the contrary, the operating contracts sometimes made are a fruitful opportunity for the concealment of losses by the owning government and of excessive profits on the part of the contracting companies.

Moreover, there is a distinct tendency under such arrangements to permit the plant to deteriorate; the operating contractor not making proper provision for the upkeep, because the capital is not his, and the owning government being disposed to let the property run down in order to avoid blame for swelling taxes. In other words, the arrangement is still political, and subject to the essential drawbacks of all political activity.

These drawbacks are largely in the nature of checks on the discretion of office-holders. The political sense of the public, derived from centuries of sad experience, compels it to withhold from government just the powers needed in business. This must be so. A government in which was vested the necessary power over the people's money to use it at discretion in the transactions of business would become an intolerable tyranny. And that is what the California Water and Power Amendment seeks to do—vest in an unknown board, to be appointed by an unknown governor, the right to dip into the state treasury at will, for any project helpful to its ambitions, and have the treasury replenished by limitless taxation. It seems incredible. But read the proposed amendment. If it is adopted, the board could rob the state poor, and practice all the discrimination and favoritism that used to be charged against some of the railroads. And being political, probably it will. No sensible people would throw away all the teachings of Anglo-Saxon history, and every other history, in the hope of getting something from politicians which is already being supplied by private capital: cheap electric energy. And that is all they can hope to get, no matter who owns the power sites—the state or the Pacific Gas and Electric Company. There is every reason in experience to believe that "power at cost," when produced politically, will cost more than power produced by private corporations for a reasonable profit, limited as at present in California by the state railroad commission.

Municipalization of electric plants for lighting purposes has been extensively carried out in Massachusetts under most careful state regulation, and a searching analysis of results to the rate-payers, made by Dr. Edmond Earle Lincoln, instructor in economics at Harvard, shows that the municipal plants do not serve the public so well as the privately-owned ones, are not so well equipped, do not extend their service so fully, avoid the less attractive business, and on the average charge consumers more for light. Our own Municipal Railroad does as little pioneering as possible, in its effort to avoid deficits. All the Massachusetts communities have gained by municipalization has been a slight saving in the cost of street lighting, a negligible matter when compared with loss of taxes on the plants. While there have been few conspicuous failures, nothing of value has been won, and losses are beginning to appear through a tendency now setting in to junk the generating plants and buy power from private companies because they can generate it cheaper than the municipalities can. At the end of 1917, twenty-eight municipal plants out of thirty-nine in Massachusetts were buying their current instead of generating it, and a number of the municipalities had scrapped their plants with heavy loss.

Yet a lot of visionaries, and one capitalist not so visionary but with water filings to sell the state, are trying to persuade the people of California to go into the hydro-electric generating business with money borrowed on the property of the taxpayers, just when the cities of Massachusetts are beginning to give it up.

In these Massachusetts cases, one way in which the comparative inefficiency of political production and management appears is in the larger loss of current in transmission; a test of maintenance of the property itself. The private companies lose 18.5 per cent. in distribution, the municipalities 24.2. And here Dr. Lincoln unconsciously brings forward one of the best jokes of this ridiculous matter. His tables of labor distribution show that the municipalities employ a disproportionately small number of linemen, and an excessive number of station employees. Was a better picture of politics ever derived from statistical tables? Political appointees do not like to climb poles and jack wires. They prefer to sit around the generating plant, like a lot of firemen with no fires to attend, and devote themselves to conversation. Hence the bottoms of the chairs in the stations are raised to normal temperature by more employees than are needed, while the distribution system, on which the customers depend for the delivery of current "at cost," grows leaky and troublesome for lack of workers. That is a picture of that dear "government ownership of public utilities." Very dear.

So, judging from Massachusetts examples, if the farmers of California decide to mortgage their farms under the Water and Power Amendment, they will pay more for their power, and their taxes will probably be higher, in order that more political appointees may warm chair bottoms and breathe the ozone around the state generating plants. And if anything goes wrong with the distribution system of the political system—that is, the system for the distribution of energy, not jobs—and the farmer calls up and complains that he can't pump water for his perishing crops, some gentlemanly chair-warmer will probably tell him to go to hell. That is not poetry, it is politics.

Politicians may be a little more polite in France than in the United States, but fundamentally human nature is the same, and job-holders are alike everywhere. Under private ownership of the Western system of French railroads in 1908, the operating costs were 67.8 per cent. of the gross revenues. The government took it over in 1909, and by 1912 the operating expenses had climbed to 89.4 per cent., an increase of 21.6. During the same period the operating costs of five privately-owned and operated roads in France had increased also, but only to the extent of 8.1 per cent., which reflected the general increase in the cost of living and of doing business. The disproportionate increase in the case of the government roads was largely owing to needless employees and excessive wages. Where 174 persons were employed by the private companies, it took 235 political appointees to do the work. Yet advocates of the proposed California Water and Power Amendment are going about the state promising to generate power at a lower cost to the user. Experience does not support the credibility of the promise.

Although the Prussian government railroads pay no taxes, and but half the wages paid railroad employees in this country, their operating costs are inflated by the excessive number of employees, and to make a creditable financial showing they have to charge about twice as much as American railroads do. And we have had our own experience of government operation of railroads. It put 1100 new officials into the central administration offices at Washington, and more than that number into the offices of the regional directors. This contributed one considerable part of the losses the government incurred.

New South Wales nationalized its railroads. Whereupon the employees grew so tyrannous and threatening in their demands for higher pay that the people had to disfranchise them. Imagine trying to disfranchise the army of employees of a California Water and Power board. The New South Wales experience clearly shows the pressure on a political management to make wages for political purposes rather than for the benefit of the taxpayers and the proper administration of the plant.

The Ontario hydro-electric development is cited by advocates of the Water and Power Amendment as an example for California to follow, though less frequently now than when the proposal was new and Ontario's bitter experience had not yet been exposed by the premier of the province. The city manager of Pasadena, for one, spoke feelingly of "the splendid example of the Toronto hydro-electric system." It was found, however, that it cost the city of Toronto for distribution of the energy it bought from the Ontario government project losses of more than $290,000 for two years, and the reasons given were too low rates and too many employees. There is no advantage to be expected from rates that are too low. What is saved to the ratepayer in that form he has to make up in taxes. Nothing is free; no government ownership alchemy can make something out of nothing.

The "government ownership of public utilities" is socialism, and socialism is the will-o'-the-wisp of industry. It is a humbug. MORTON TODD.

The Ballad of Bouillabaisse.

A street there is in Paris famous,
For which no rhyme our language yields,
Rue Neuve des Petits Champs its name is—
The New Street of the Little Fields.
And here's an inn, not rich and splendid,
But still in comfortable case;
The which in youth I oft attended,
To eat a bowl of Bouillabaisse.

This Bouillabaisse a noble dish is—
A sort of soup, or broth, or brew,
Or hatchforth of all sorts of dishes,
That Greenwich never could outdo:
Greenherbs, red peppers, mussels, saffron,
Soles, onions, garlic, roach, and dace:
All these you eat at Terré's tavern,
In that one dish of Bouillabaisse.

Indeed a rich and savory stew 't is;
And true philosophers, methinks,
Who love all sorts of natural beauties,
Should love good victuals and good drinks.
And Cordelier or Benedictine
Might gladly, sure, his lot embrace,
Nor find a fast-day too afflicting,
Which served him up a Bouillabaisse.

I wonder if the house still there is?
Yes, here the lamp is, as before:
The smiling red-cheeked écaillère is Still opening oysters at the door.
Is Terré still alive and able?
I recollect his droll grimace:
He'd come and smile before your table,
And hope you liked your Bouillabaisse.

We enter—nothing's changed or older.
"How's Monsieur Terré, waiter, pray?"
The waiter starts and shrugs his shoulder—
"Monsieur is dead this many a day."
"It is the lot of saint and sinner,
So honest Terré's run his race."
"What will Monsieur require for dinner?"
"Say, do you still cook Bouillabaisse?"

"Oh, oui, Monsieur," 's the waiter's answer;
"Quel vin Monsieur désire-t-il?"
"Tell me a good one."—"That I can, sir:
The Chambertin with yellow seal."
"So Terré's gone," I say, and sink in My old accustomed corner-place;
"He's done with feasting and with drinking,
With Burgundy and Bouillabaisse."

My old accustomed corner here is,
The table still is in the nook;
Ah! vanished many a busy year is
This well-known chair since last I took.
When first I saw ye, cari luoghi,
I'd scarce a beard upon my face,
And now a grizzled, grim old fogey,
I sit and wait for Bouillabaisse.

Where are you, old companions trusty
Of early days here met to dine?
Come, waiter, quick! a flagon crusty—
I'll pledge them in the good old wine.
The kind old voices and old faces
My memory can quick retrace;
Around the board they take their places,
And share the wine and Bouillabaisse.

There's Jack has made a wondrous marriage;
There's laughing Tom is laughing yet;
There's brave Augustus drives his carriage;
There's poor old Fred in the Gazette;
On James's head the grass is growing:
Good Lord! the world has wagged apace
Since here we set the claret flowing,
And drank, and ate the Bouillabaisse.

Ah me! how quick the days are flitting!
I mind me of a time that's gone,
When here I'd sit, as now I'm sitting,
In this same place—but not alone.
A fair young form was nestled near me,
A dear, dear face looked fondly up,
And sweetly spoke and smiled to cheer me
—There's no one now to share my cup.

I drink it as the Fates ordain it.
Come, fill it, and have done with rhymes:
Fill up the lonely glass, and drain it
In memory of the dear old times.
Welcome to wine, what'er the seal is,
And sit you down and say your grace
With thankful heart, what'er the meal is.
—Here comes the smoking Bouillabaisse!
—William Makepeace Thackeray.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Lieutenant-Colonel A. J. Gordon Kane of Washington and Chauncey Depew are the only two living men who attended Lincoln's funeral. Lieutenant-Colonel Kane is eighty-two and Mr. Depew recently celebrated his eighty-eighth birthday.

Solomon Dabinski, a Polish boy who arrived in this country a year ago, traveling in the steerage and with no knowledge of the English language, has recently won the bronze medal of the National Society of Colonial Daughters of Washington for the best essay on the life of Washington.

Dr. Alice Hamilton is the only woman member of Harvard's medical faculty. Dr. Hamilton is a New York woman who received her medical training at the universities of Michigan, Leipzig, Munich, Johns Hopkins, Chicago, and the Institut Pasteur at Paris. Dr. Hamilton's especial work has been bacteriology.

The Persian minister to Washington, Mirza Hussein Khan Alai, is a fluent English scholar, a fact that doubtless accounts for his mingling in American society more freely than envoys from his country usually have. However, he is a loyal Persian, and the embassy is said to house a Persian collection of great value.

Isaac F. Marcossou, the American journalist, was received by the prince regent at the Imperial Palace, Tokyo, recently. This was the first private audience to a journalist ever granted by the imperial prince, either as crown prince or as prince regent in Japan. Mr. Marcossou was presented to his imperial highness by the American ambassador.

Miss Ivy Williams is the first woman in England to qualify as a barrister. Eight other women have passed their finals, but Miss Williams is the first to be called to the bar. However, the woman barrister does not intend to practice law. She is already a Doctor of Laws and lecturer on law at an Oxford women's college—a position she means to retain.

Dr. Francis W. Pennell, curator of the botanical department of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences, is in charge of an expedition sent by Harvard University, the Smithsonian Institution, and the New York Botanical Garden to compare the flora of the different ranges of the Andes. Dr. Pennell is probably more expert in classifying the flora of the Andes than any other botanist.

Georges Urbain, a member of the French Institute and professor at the Sorbonne, announces that after fifteen years of research he has succeeded in identifying a new element which he calls "celtium." Celtium, which is similar in several respects to radium, may prove equally beneficial. It is so called by the professor because its discovery was due to Celtic brains. Professor Urbain was aided in his research by Frederick Webb of San Francisco, a graduate of the Harvard School of Applied Chemistry.

Earl French of Ypres, British field marshal, is the first of the English heroes of the great war to visit this country. General French was here about ten years ago when the Mexican question was acute, when he spent much time in conference about intervention. The field marshal was born in Kent, but is of Irish blood through his father and Scotch through his mother, an Eccles of Edinburgh. General French presents the unusual example of a great soldier being made of a theological student. His early youth was spent preparing to take holy orders. Lady French is renowned as a British sportswoman.

Mrs. Alexander P. Moore, famous for thirty years as Lillian Russell, "the most beautiful woman on the American stage," has died at the age of sixty, after a brief illness. Lillian Russell, wife of Alexander Moore, publisher of the Pittsburgh Leader, whose maiden name was Helen Leonard, was born in Clinton, Iowa, December 4, 1861. Her mother was a singer of local note; her father later became a member of the Chicago printing firm of Knight & Leonard. Lillian was educated at the Convent of the Sacred Heart in Chicago, where she studied vocal and violin music and sang in the church choir. Strangely enough, it was her voice, and not her beauty, that opened the way to a stage career. She was considered the "ugly duckling" of the family, but it was her ambition to be an opera singer. She studied for opera under Leopold Damrosch, and her first appearance on the stage was in the chorus of Rice's "Pinafore" company in 1879. Incidentally, her first marriage was to Harry Braham, conductor of Rice's company. Later she sang ballads at Tony Pastor's theatre in New York, when she first took the stage name by which she became so famous. Her early portraits bear out the statement that her extraordinary beauty was a middle-aged development. Her later stage career is familiar to every one. Lillian Russell was married four times. Her second husband was Edward Solomon, conductor of the Casino orchestra; the third was John Chatterton, the operatic tenor known as Signor Perugini; and in 1912 she married Alexander P. Moore. Miss Russell was a woman of wide interests. Throughout the war she was widely known in Red Cross work, and later in reconstruction and welfare work. Shortly before her death she appeared before a congressional committee to give a report of her investigations of European conditions with reference to American immigration regulations.

ONE STILL YOUNG.

Stephen McKenna's "While I Remember" Glances Backward from a Not Too Distant Point of View.

Stephen McKenna lacks the style of Augustine Birrell, or James O'Donnell Bennett at his best; but they are about the only English stylists we think of at present who would be justified in passing him any advice. Mencken and Van Dorn may say their little pieces with more sugar or more devilishness at times, but neither one with more ice-pick point and meat-axe edge. So Steve's reminiscences are going to be right good reading for anybody that will read them, and it is the present reviewer's notion that many will. Our author believes in compulsory arbitration and in hanging the Kaiser, and he explodes the Shavian bomb that the English are unfit to govern themselves—in which, if he is right, they are not unique. That's the sort of person he is. Otherwise, he is easy to agree with, and a delightful companion on a rainy day.

He is a young man yet; and as that hallucination is cherished by many octogenarians it should be said that he is probably still in his thirties. Having, with disconcerting precocity, tossed off "Sonia," "The Education of Eric Lane," "Midas and Son," and a few other titles of works it would seem patronizing merely to call good, it occurred to him that it would be a bright idea to set down his recollections while he could recollect them—a departure from the usual method; in short, an invention. This offers a close-up, and a rather merciless close-up, of things that have not yet altogether passed from the mundane stage and are still fresh enough in general misunderstanding to call for elucidation. McKenna has vivid mental pictures of English society and of the havoc war played with it; and no one has more pitilessly depicted the psychological steps of its degeneracy. Prefatorily he remarks: "Those who first drew breath in Queen Victoria's reign may congratulate themselves on having passed in thirty years from the civilization of the Stone Age to that of the Cities of the Plain." And that illustrates the weapon of the man, who hunts down his ideas, not with a club nor yet a sword, but perhaps with one of those combination things set with obsidian teeth with which the Aztecs used to frolic after their favorite human game. Before the hunt, however, let us sample some of his antiquity. Here is a bit of real quality, dealing with his school days:

Westminster is so much the embodiment and shrine of English history that even the alien and the iconoclast can not spend six years in the shadow of the Abbey without becoming steeped in the spirit and associations of the place. It is the influence of such foundations that makes of English life its present compromise between the rational and the traditional. From their places in the stalls could be seen the arches of the triforium which are filled at coronations by the Westminster Scholars: no king, they assert, can be duly crowned unless he is acclaimed by their triple shout of "Vivat Rex." It is their privilege to be present in the Palace Yard when the sovereign opens Parliament; Scholars and Town Boys walk, of unchallenged right, into the gallery of the House of Commons, Scholars—in cap and gown—into the gallery of the House of Lords and, on Sundays, on to the Terrace; when the Courts of Justice were at Westminster, they could wander unchecked into Westminster Hall. Their daily service takes place in the Poets' Corner; they are present at State funerals, their confirmation is held in Henry VII's chapel; and the whole Abbey is their heritage. Is not the school descended lineally from that group of lay scholars whom the monks of Westminster taught? Is not the monks' dormitory their Great School? Among the documents discovered of late years in the Abbey Muniment Room is a record, under the year 1284, of expense, being provision for the teaching of scholars, and a further record, under the year 1339, of payments for "Westminster School." Already old when Winchester and Eton were founded, with its roots struck deep in the Abbey's earliest history and with its life immemorially intertwined with the life of the Abbey, the two have remained side by side until Westminster is the last of the London schools to resist the pressure which has already urged younger rivals from their seats. Changing slowly with the slow unfolding of English history, the school was re-founded by Queen Elizabeth on a secular footing; and the monitor of the week, kneeling with his back to Busby's birch-table and facing the school, returns thanks "pro fundatrice nostra Regina Elizabetha" on the spot where Robert South prayed "pro rege Carolo" on the 30th of January, 1649. It retains, by the Act of Uniformity, its "almost unique privilege of using Latin in religious offices," though—as a concession to the Reformers—the monkish pronunciation was abandoned for that which was universal English form until misguided empiricists set up confusion where none existed before by introducing a "modern" method.

"From here" he goes to things contemporary, handling social conditions thus:

When those who opened their eyes on the second half of the 'eighties were still young children, the first attack was made on the outposts of Victorian "respectability": the "new woman" made her appearance, defiantly smoking in public and—until threatened with violence by an outraged and susceptible mob—bicycling about the streets of London in "bloomers"; new ideas were spread, new rights suggested, and an alarming new freedom discussion inaugurated by the plays of Ibsen; a new wave of riches poured into England from the Rand, their possessors resolute to enjoy them without the restrictions of an outworn decorum. The epithet which has become the historic description of these years is "roaring," and, if it described something which by modern standards was mild and blameless, the vigor of the word registers the public misgiving and astonishment at the thing which it described. Nevertheless, though this bawling exuberance gave an earnest of what would come when the brawlers had discredited Victorianism, as yet they misconducted themselves clandestinely or "under the eye of perpetual disapprobation": the nod and frown of the court were still potent; and the rulers of half-a-dozen great houses decided effectively, and subject only to the veto of the queen, who should be received in the small and envied world known as 'society.'

Though the young girl unchaperoned was the young girl abandoned, it is probably the young bachelor who would have most reason to dread the obligations entailed by a plunge back into the 'nineties. Etiquette ordained that he must leave cards at any house where he had dined or danced, and a call in those strict days, when no one but a sloven would dare to be seen without a tall hat between the months of May and July, postulated that the caller must array himself in frock-coat and all its concomitants and, for a reason still obscure, must carry his hat into the drawing-room. Later, as a concession to human weakness and in imitation of the bar, a morning-coat was permitted; serge suits and bowler hats, exhibiting themselves tentatively at either end of the week, were excused by a presumed sojourn in the country; and then, with the speed of an avalanche, the reign of dandified dowdiness set in, tidying itself slowly into comfort that was also presentable.

The men who in 1914 were of military age, as that definition was used at the outbreak of the war, were born at earliest in the middle of the 'eighties. Queen Victoria was to reign for half a generation longer, Lord Beaconsfield was but lately dead, Mr. Gladstone had ahead of him more than a dozen years of life and one more term as prime minister, and Mr. Parnell was appearing for the first time as the maker and breaker of ministries.

Abroad, Prince Bismarck was still chancellor to the Emperor William I, and the third French Republic was young enough to be still unsteady on its legs; but, since British fears of Russian aggression had been for the most part interred with the bones of Disraeli's spirited foreign policy, the chief imperial problems related to the yet new British responsibility for Egypt and to border wars and punitive expeditions on the fringe of the empire. At home, the conservatives wagged by the tail of the "fourth party," were coming to terms with the liberal-unionists who had seceded from Mr. Gladstone in 1886; the liberal party, committed to home rule as a first charge, unless the findings of the Parnell commission should discredit its policy, was shelving the rest of its programme and secretly waiting for its leader's death in order to infuse a stronger radicalism than was palatable in the lifetime of a man who had first held office under Sir Robert Peel.

On either side of either house, as on either side of the Irish Sea, the dominant political problem from 1885 to 1895 was the problem of Irish self-government: on this old parties were split and new parties formed; from this proceeded the policies and controversies which filled the life of Parliament to the exclusion of almost everything else for the twenty years from 1895 to the great war. In the first home rule bill and the liberal defeat of 1886, in the Parnell commission and the second home rule bill, in the Parnell divorce and the defeat of Mr. Gladstone's last administration, in the constitutional struggle between Lords and Commons from 1893 to 1911, in the Wyndham land legislation, the devolution scheme and the fall of Mr. Wyndham, in the Irish councils bill, the third home rule bill, the threat of rebellion and the outbreak of civil war, English political history lay under the sable shadow of Ireland, English political interests and developments were sacrificed to Irish demands, and English political parties, jointly and severally, one after another, paid for their failure to give Ireland an acceptable form of self-government.

Though an Irishman brought up in England may lose the faith, the speech, and the nationality of the one country without acquiring those of the other, he will inevitably be forced into an alternating sympathy with both; and, while he may hesitate to explain the English to the Irish or the Irish to the English, he is bound, by any affection that he may feel for either, to disperse by any means in his power the cloud of tragic misunderstanding which has for so long poisoned the life of both.

After Westminster, Oxford; and Christ Church. Here is a bit of the real old Toryism, human as a hack-rack:

To a freshman, the etiquette and technique of Oxford abound in real and, still more, in imaginary pitfalls. He may live for years on the same staircase as a man one term his senior, but, unless they have been introduced, he must never bow nor say "good-morning" to him. The senior would, perhaps, leave a card on the freshman, choosing a moment when he was not at home; the freshman must return his call, but it was not enough to leave his card; he must go on calling until he ran him to earth. In all things a freshman must comfort himself humbly, taking a distant seat in the junior common room and leaving the arm-chairs in front of the fire to those who better deserved them. There were rules of dress and rules of conduct; there were clubs which a man would feel honored to join and clubs which he would prudently avoid; there were games worth playing and games that were waste of time.

The salt of reason is all through the work, a novel and refreshing thing after so much of unreason, of passion, of hate and prejudice. After shocks such as the world has recently suffered, justice is apt to limp. But perhaps in this passage one has his due who missed it sorely:

More quickly forgotten than anything else in these days was the nation's debt of gratitude to Lord Haldane for re-organizing the army and for preparing, in the expeditionary force, the finest fighting weapon in recorded history. His admiration for Germany, his visits to the Kaiser, and his study of German methods led a people which prided itself on its dogged common sense to charge him with treacherous German sympathies; political opponents, eager enough before the party truce to discredit the ministry by destroying one of its most prominent members, encouraged the belief that Lord Haldane, while in temporary charge of the war office, had obstructed the mobilization of the expeditionary force; and the man who had made the new model army was credited with designs on the country which it saved. When once it is recognized that the English, in their present credulity and ignorance, are unfit for self-government, these aberrations become easily intelligible; it is not so easy to understand or justify the action of Lord Haldane's colleague who, for all their worthless moral support and for all their entreaties that he should remain in the cabinet, allowed him to be sacrificed to popular clamor without raising a voice or stirring a finger to protect him publicly.

Perhaps we shall never have a much more logical exposition of the way war operates to wreck a people's moral foundations than this:

To civilians, the crisis of March, 1918, arose suddenly; they may be thankful that it ended no less suddenly, but the results of the crisis outlived the crisis itself. In so far as it is true to say that the English ever lost their heads, they lost them between the March offensive and the December general election of 1918. For more than four years there had been the relaxation of bonds which is natural when life is no longer secure: sexual relationships became increasingly promiscuous, marriages were contracted, abandoned, and dissolved with reckless disregard of private morals or public responsibility; and the craving for such excitement as would bring forgetfulness led to the excessive indulgence of every physical appetite.

While this relaxation continued at a steadily increasing pace, it was only in the final months of the war that the loss of self-control became inconsistent with a balanced mind. The sordid scandals of this last phase, born of intemperance in drink or drugs and stimulated to their climax by undisciplined passions, were occasionally dragged to light in a police court or at a coroner's inquest; but in degeneracy as in crime, it is usually the inexpert who is detected, and any one who lived in London during those feverish months had forced upon his notice a spectacle of debauchery which would have swelled the record of scandal if it had been made public, but which is mercifully forgotten because it was incredible.

In short phrase, the restraints of modern civilization were burst on the resurgence of primitive man. Honorable, kindly, fastidious, gentle and reserved spirits, dragged back across the ages, lied and cheated, fought and bullied in an orgy of intrigue and self-seeking, of intoxication and madness. Only in this way and at this price could those who had fared delicately and lived softly endure hardships which for generations or centuries had been removed from the average experience of civilization; the bravery of the savage emerged hand in hand with the savage's ferocity, his license, his superstition, and his credulity.

Nor is it all, or largely gloomy. It is merely human, natural; natural to woodsyne. In reading it you feel: "Yes, it must have been about that way." And when a book makes you feel like that, it is pretty certain to be because it is a good book. How delicious it is to read such exposures of our common nature and our common failings, such reflections of our little foibles of egoism and vanity as this description of the recession devolution:

The war lent a powerful impulse to this [social] promiscuity. The old entertaining was perforce suspended; but London still contained several hundred men and women who were bitten with a craving to meet the celebrity of the hour; and war is prolific of celebrities. Every day they threw up on the patient shores of England the man who had invented the new collapsible machine-gun, the man who had dropped bombs on Bagdad, the man who knew President Wilson's real feelings, the man whose slim volume of war-sonnets had convulsed the tea-tables of Chelsea. Night after night they were to be met at dinner; as their eyes lost the early dazed look, they became men with a message; later, as their message, whether on Bagdad or the White House, became crisply stereotyped, they faded to the back of the room and made way for some one yet more arresting.

And the effect on society, as far as it may profitably be defined? McKenna speaks as one having authority. He knows, it appears. If he does not, he is a successful conjuror of appearances into realities or realities into appearances, whichever you will. This cuts:

The intelligent foreigner, revisiting London after twenty years, would find difficulty in discovering the new great hostesses, the new great conversationalists, the wits, the beauties, even the eccentrics. The most famous Duchess of Devonshire is dead; Stafford House is a museum; where are the new stars shining? Who are the successors to the "Souls"? Among the authors and statesmen, the artists and actors, the soldiers and musicians, the journalists and financiers of the day there is abundant wisdom and wit, their women are sometimes radiantly beautiful; but it would be difficult to name more than six of the younger generation whose force of personality or strength of lung could prevail over the clatter of a society wherein a machine-gun-fire of colloquialisms, Robeyisms and the signs and countersigns of an exotic group do duty for intellect. Not until society has subdivided into manageable groups will a single weak human voice be able to make itself heard; and, until it is less blatantly vulgar, it would be surprising if a voice worth hearing cared to try.

In the reaction of the war nothing seems to matter. The argot of London varies from week to week, like the style of dressing and dancing; but the atmosphere is the same, the restlessness is the same, the mad striving after effect is the same, the want of purpose is the same; and it may be doubted whether the money and energy demanded of such a life are justified by the tepid, flat pleasure which they purchase. In ten years London has become steadily and uncaringly more greedy and vulgar. Breeding is a memory of childhood; manners grew blunt and were discarded during the years between the South African war and 1914; happiness has been lost to view in the hunt for distraction; and success is measured, arithmetically, by invitations.

Any writer trying to deal with the flow of events knows that the meanest thing to look up is the thing that happened a few weeks back. Any historian knows that the meanest history to try to trace is that of a few years ago, before sources have been classified and digested. This book, delightful in style, invigorating in treatment, is particularly a book of the recent, baffling period we dimly and confusedly remember. Its presentation is a real service to those seeking to understand their times—the madness "yesterday's madness did prepare"; to mangle old Omar a bit. For England, for the world, this is a transitional period; so we shall not attempt to state the conclusion. But a finale says: "One movement is ended. An intermezzo is playing, perhaps is already drawing to a close. Soon the new movement will begin."

The reader of this book is going to enjoy some interesting hours.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending June 3, 1922 (five days), were $116,500,000; for the week ending June 4, 1921 (five days), $108,300,000; a gain of $8,200,000.

For the first time since early last fall the market has had a full three-point reaction, as measured by the even figures of the average price swings of twenty-five industrial stocks. And, at the time this is being written, it appears to be likely that a further reaction, to correct a temporarily over-bought situation

But the speculator for a long pull should resolve to hold through any reaction which may possibly come at this time, confident that considerably higher prices will be reached before the dull, hot days of midsummer put a natural check upon dealings. And, further, it must be remembered that in every bull year prices normally make their highs in the fall market. And, if one sells now in anticipation of a reaction that may not materialize, there may be the disagreeable aftermath of having to buy back at higher levels.

The purpose in attempting to forecast the possible extent of the reaction which may follow the spring bulge is to forewarn those who are holding speculative stocks that they may be armed with confidence to "sit tight." Only traders who are close to the market should attempt to take advantage of the setback by getting out of stocks with the idea of repurchasing lower.

Of course, any reaction that may follow the halt in the upward movement may be expected to be more pronounced in some groups of stocks than in others, just as the forward movement has been more extensive in some groups than in others. There has also been considerable discrepancy in price movements within certain groups. For instance, in the motors, Studebaker has gone far ahead of Maxwell "A" and "B," Chandler, General Motors, and Hupp. Crucible has, until lately, lagged behind the other steel shares. Probably stocks like Baldwin Locomotive, Corn Products, and Studebaker have been temporarily distributed by pools which expect to repurchase on recessions.

And there are a number of stocks which might easily move counter to a reactionary movement in other parts of the list. U. S. Realty & Improvement, for instance, has just issued its 1921 earnings statement showing earnings of nearly $17 a share. In the last two years fully $33 a share has been earned on this stock, and the outlook for its real estate holdings and building operations is so bright that it is hardly conceivable that present prices adequately discount conditions.

Sears-Roebuck has risen but little above its record low, although mail order sales are improving from week to week and the outlook is for a gradual return to large profits and high selling prices for this issue.

The leather business has so recently recovered from severe depression that Central Leather has not yet attracted enough confident buying to lift the shares out of the distinct bargain class.

Likewise, American Can, Endicott-Johnson, Pacific Gas & Electric, Associated Dry Goods, Westinghouse Electric, Certain-Teed Products, National Lead, International Cement, American Cotton Oil, and American Linseed may all go higher on actual or prospective earnings, or on developments known to affect them favorably. These special movements on the up-side may occur before, during, or after any reaction that may now depress the main body of stocks.

In addition to the reopening of the mines and the definite signs of hardening in the price of copper metal as bull arguments on the copper stocks, there may before long be injected into the general market situation for these shares the favorable factor of an Allied loan to Germany. Germany used to buy a very large proportion of the copper exported from the United States before the war, and it is doubtful if her supplies of the metal have been more than partially replenished since 1918. Among the copper and other metal and mining stocks there may be mentioned Anaconda, Butte & Superior, Chino, Cerro de Pasco, Chile, Kennecott, Inspiration, Ray, Utah, International Nickel, Dome Mines, and McIntyre Porcupine.

Among the rails, Pittsburgh & West Virginia, New Haven, and Southern Pacific have stood out during recent reactionary sessions. Pittsburgh & West Virginia has been favored partly because its coal subsidiary operates non-union mines, now on full time; New Haven has been bought because of the improved earnings outlook, due to lower operating expenses and an adjustment of freight rates on shipments handled in conjunction with roads west of the Hudson River.

It is probable that when the market starts up again—if the reaction does run true to form—railroad stocks will have a more prominent part, first, because investment buying, finding the yield of high-grade bonds fully adjusted to current money market conditions, will turn first to old-line, dividend-paying rails, and, second, because earnings results promise to be sufficiently attractive to invite

Stocks were definitely headed for what promised to be a sharp setback when the announcement of the Bethlehem-Lackawanna merger, with hints that Lackawanna was to be taken in at a price far above its market level, concentrated buying in Lackawanna and a half a dozen other independent steels. Brisk run-ups in these stocks—the movement ran to more than twenty points in Lackawanna Steel in two sessions—brought about some new buying in various parts of the list and also drove some timid shorts to cover. But, after the fireworks were over, there were no indications that the position of the main body of stock had been changed.

A reaction at this time could bring the average of industrials down to between 88 and 90 without in any way suggesting a reversal of the trend. In fact, if the current reaction gains any headway, the market could hardly be expected to show much resistance before the level of late March and early April is again reached.

4. MARKETABILITY

Although of less importance than Credit of Issuer, Safety of Principal, and Stability of Income, a good bond should be readily salable in case the investor wishes to convert it into cash at any time prior to maturity.

This feature is realized by selecting bonds which are either dealt in on some exchange or which are dealt in with sufficient frequency elsewhere to insure a market being maintained for them.

We stand ready at all times to & Ohio and Lehigh Valley are in line for dividend increases.

The oil stocks have had a substantial advance, and, judging from the market following that they have gained in the early stages of the bull market of 1922, they are likely to play a large part in the secondary advance of early summer and probably also in the fall rise. Pacific Oil, California Petroleum, Associated Oil, and Standard Oil of California have been the leaders on the Stock Exchange, the National Industrial Conference Board, an association of employers, reports early this month that slight wage increases have taken place in several industrial centres, brought about partly by improved conditions in the plants concerned, and partly by an increased demand for labor. In the industrial sections of the Middle West a shortage in some classes of skilled workers is appearing and wage reductions in factories and mills are becoming less frequent, indicating that wages in most of these industries are now about at a level in keeping with prevailing living costs. A most encouraging feature in the situation is the general belief that price levels have touched bottom figures, and that such adjustments as may be made henceforth will be in the nature of stabilization, with upward tendencies rather than lower.

The improvement of trade in the past three months has given rise to some unduly bright forecasts, but these boom prophecies are the offspring of hope rather than of sound reasoning. A conservative analysis of the situation creates a doubt as to our ability to maintain for long any considerable expansion beyond our present rate of industrial output. When we reach the point where production satisfies the requirements of domestic consumers we will still be considerably below the peak activity for industry, and if maximum capacity is to be realized and maintained we must find and establish strong foreign markets to absorb our surplus. As a creditor nation, when we sell, some means of payment must be arranged, and as yet no method has been established for financing that part of our trade which requires long credits. Many plans have been proposed, but the machinery for long-term commercial loans is still lacking. The prospect of large imports to offset large exports is one which fills the country with alarm, and a tariff bill to protect us against this calamity is pending. And there you are—no imports, no exports—no exports, limited production—limited production, restricted activity—with full prosperity still waiting.

The William R. Staats Company is a member of a syndicate offering a new issue of $5,500,000 Sperry Flour Company first mortgage 6 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, due June 1, 1942, price 98½ and interest, yielding 6.10 per cent.

These bonds, in the opinion of counsel, will be a direct obligation of the company and will be secured by an absolute first mortgage on all fixed assets now owned or hereafter acquired. The fixed assets of the company have, according to an appraisal made in 1920 by the American Appraisal Company to which is added the value of properties acquired subsequent to the above appraisal, a reproduction value of $13,501,491 and a sound value of $11,289,631. In addition to the above, net current assets as shown by the consolidated balance sheet as of April 30, 1922, amount to $4,235,955.57.

In order to handle the increasing business of the securities department of the American National Bank its stockholders have brought into existence an affiliated corporation, to be known as the American National Company, which is capitalized for $200,000, and whose shares are owned by the stockholders of the American National Bank.

The new company will occupy quarters on the ground floor of the Merchants' Exchange Building, adjacent to the banking room, and its actual operations will date from June 1st. Its directors are P. E. Bowles, George U. Hind, John A. Britton, H. M. A. Miller, F. A. Somers, William Thomas, O. D. Jacoby, George N. O'Brien, Roger Sherman, and B. B. Brown. The officers will be: P. E. Bowles, president; John A. Britton, vice-president; George M. Bowles, vice-president and treasurer; Roger Sherman, secretary; B. B. Brown, manager.

The American National Company will pursue the policy of handling the same conservative investment securities that have been handled in the past by the American National Bank.

George H. Burr & Co. are offering the Amalgamated Sugar Company first (closed) mortgage 7 per cent. gold bonds, due April 1, 1937. Price, 100 and interest, yielding 7 per cent. The Amalgamated Sugar Company is engaged in one of the basic and essential industries and ranks among the six largest beet-sugar producing and refining companies in the United States. These bonds are a direct first mortgage on assets valued at more than $10,000,000, comprising refining plants, sites, farm lands, irrigation systems, etc. Annual net earnings for the last twelve years average over one and three-fourths times annual interest charges on these bonds. Annual sinking fund to be applied to the purchase of bonds in the open market, not to

The Stamp of Approval

The only bond buyer who can afford to make a really thorough, first-hand investigation of a bond is the bond house that originally buys the issue for resale to its clients.

The individual investor must rely upon the "underwriting house" to establish the permanent safety and investment merit of the bonds he buys. Indeed, to him that is the primary function of the bond house.

The clients of Blyth, Witter & Co. have come to place a fine faith in the integrity and conservatism of our underwritings. They know that every bond we sell must measure up to high standards of safe investment—for otherwise, we would not recommend it.

Perhaps you have funds now waiting for investment. If you are of a conservative turn of mind on such matters, you will find the bonds we sell to be good bonds for you to buy. An inquiry places you under no obligation.

exceed the callable price, or for calling same at 105 and accrued interest, is provided in an amount of $200,000 per annum, commencing April 1, 1924. This sinking fund payment will be increased by an amount equal to all dividends paid on the common stock during the life of these bonds.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering the unmaturing portion of an issue of Logan Municipal Irrigation District, Logan County, Colorado, 6 per cent. bonds at prices to yield 6½ per cent. This district was formed and the bonds issued in 1911, at which time the entire issue was purchased by a large Colorado institution and held by them for investment until purchased by the local house. The bonds were sold to provide the cost of a storage reservoir, supplementing the direct flow then being obtained from the Platte River. The system has stood the test of time and proven highly successful, as shown by the increased crop returns, values, and population since its installation. All the land within the district is highly cultivated, the average holding being but ninety-one acres. The population is estimated at about 3600 and the district adjoins the city of Sterling with a 1920 census of 6500.

The lands within the Logan Irrigation District have an appraised value of $1,715,625. The assessed valuation is $940,810, while the bonded debt is only $444,000—about one-fourth of the conservative value of the lands.

These bonds, maturing from 1923 to 1931, are offered at prices to yield 6½ per cent., income tax exempt.

Geary, Meiggs & Co. have moved into larger quarters on the seventh floor of the new California Commercial Union Insurance Building, owing to the demands of increasing business.

A book of memoirs written by the ex-Crown Prince of Germany has been published in the United States by Charles Scribner's Sons has also been brought out simultaneously in England, France, Germany, and other countries. The book, which has been written by the ex-Crown Prince's own hand during his exile in Holland, describes his home and school life, his military training, his experiences at court, and his visits to foreign royalties, among them Queen Victoria, the Czar, Abdul Hamid of Turkey, Archduke Ferdinand of Austria, and King Edward of England. He expresses a very high opinion of the latter, both as ruler and man. Part of the book is devoted to the part the ex-Crown Prince played in the war, particularly in connection with the Verdun drive. One of the many surprising revelations of the book, which, the publishers say, is written with evident sincerity, is the light it sheds on the ex-Crown Prince's character. Publication of these memoirs is said to have been forbidden by the ex-Kaiser, and this may have been because of the fact that the book very openly criticizes his policies and character. The lack of sympathy between father and son is evident, according to the Scribners.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Admirers of M. Maeterlinck have wondered why, in an era more interested in the mystic than any other of modern times, the great Belgian researcher has been silent. Before the war his was practically the only authoritative and dignified voice lifted in the interests of the uncanny. Not that M. Maeterlinck was or is an advocate for psychical manifestations. His peculiar merit has been the conjunction in one mind of the agnostic and the experimenter. His mind is both skeptical and open—a truly remarkable condition. For most skeptics are like the famous atheist who believed in no God and worshipped him. The average skeptic is so proud of his superior mental position that he will not risk his balance by investigation; but M. Maeterlinck is the true agnostic. He holds no brief for either side, but takes all the evidence and weighs it. However, his bolts on the subconscious mind, forward memory, etc., and the sort of manifestation that M. Flammarion and M. Richet are now presenting to an astonished world were shot long ago in "The Unknown Guest." "The Double Garden," and several others. Evidently the Belgian researcher does not believe in repetition. But those early books with a scientific attitude toward the mysterious should now receive a belated popularity. Maeterlinck's new book is of a philosophical rather than a psychological nature. "The Great Secret" (The Century Company; $2) is rather a history of man's attempt to explain the inexplicable. It is a history of religion and a history of human thought, incredible as it seems, compressed into less than 300 pages. Incidentally, it appears that there is nothing new under the sun. The Darwinian theory crops up 6000 years ago in the Brahman Law of Manu; and Paracelsus, the medieval metaphysician, held that the subconscious was the seat of all human ailments—did M. Coué get a tip from him, we wonder? In short, "The Great Secret" is warranted to give one a great deal of information of the sort the professional philosopher has a monopoly on and to clarify one's chaotic conceptions of early psychology.

It would be interesting to know what has caused the revival of the short story—perhaps one should say the acceleration of the short story. The habitual reader of magazine fiction may stare, aghast, but the facts remain that there are two kinds of short story—the commercial and the genuine—and that more and more first-class writers are writing short stories or publishing old short stories than ever before. Dickens, James, Kipling, and Wells wrote tales, but with the exception of Kipling they never modeled them on the accepted short-story model of today. Perhaps it is the growing influence of the Russians and the French, masters of the genre, even though America claims priority with Poe. More likely, the public, surfeited with the sameness of novels, has turned for relief to the more various material of the briefer form of fiction.

Two collections of short stories have appeared during the week that reach a high-water mark in this field—"The Garden Party," by Katherine Mansfield (Knopf), and "The Hounds of Banba," by Daniel Corkery (Huebsch; $1.50). The latter are Sinn Féin tales of present-day Ireland of which one can only say they are perfect. They pull the short story back to its proper boundaries, the history of an incident. As the material is dramatic and presumably veracious, and as Mr. Corkery's style is of the superb order that conceals art and becomes a veritable medium, there is really nothing more to be said than to recommend "The Hounds of Banba."

"The Garden Party" is a very different thing, and it will undoubtedly interest more people than the stories discussed above. In fact Miss Mansfield's stories could be taken as the exact antithesis of David Corkery's. Where his are in perfect technique of the established form and depend for their interest on pure action and for their beauty on faultless style, Miss Mansfield's have an iconoclastic technique and a rather consciously beautiful style. Action is practically nil. The unusual quality of this young English writer's work is that she does not "compose" her material. She is not concerned with plot. The result is that her stories have a remarkable vraisemblance to life. Miss Mansfield's stories have the air of saying, "If this were a novel it would end thus so: since it is not it won't end at all. Things rarely do in life." All this means that her work has an extraordinary freshness and originality, not the hectic originality of a Poe or even an Arthur Machen. Miss Mansfield's head is screwed on all right. But she has had the inspiration to write of things as they really appear to her, and the result is charming. It is probably unique in character in English fiction.

R. G.

Wilfrid Ewart's war story, "Way of Revelation," recently published by the Putnam's, has sold 12,000 copies in England.

Notes of Books and Authors.

It is rumored that Elizabeth of "German Garden" fame is putting the finishing touches to a long novel. When Elizabeth wrote her first best-seller she was the Countess von Arnim and now she is the Countess Russell.

Dr. Henry Van Dyke is contributing a poem, Professor Allan Marquand a story of the monument, and Professor Thomas J. Wertenbaker an account of the battle for a book in commemoration of the battle of Princeton and the erection of the Princeton battle monument. The monument will be unveiled on June 9 by President Harding, and the book will be published this summer by the Princeton University Press.

Harrison Rhodes' satirical novel, "High Life," which McBride's published a year ago, will soon be produced as a play, with Henry Miller, Blanche Bates, and Ruth Chatterton in the leading rôles. The dramatic version of the story has been prepared by A. E. Thomas.

About five years ago a schoolmaster in a little village in Scotland sat down and told all he knew and all he thought about education as it is practiced in his country. His confession, which was published as "A Dominie's Log," scored somewhat of a sensation in both Great Britain and America, and eventually caused the dismissal of the author, A. S. Neill. Now Mr. Neill has come forward with a new book, "A Dominie in Doubt" (Robert M. McBride & Co.), in which he reflects upon Freud, socialism, the human race, and reconsiders his opinions on education in the same delightfully casual manner which distinguished his first book.

"The Life of the Scorpion," by Jean Henri Fabre, completing the great French naturalist's Souvenirs entomologiques, is announced for publication this fall. Thirteen volumes devoted to the spider, the fly, to wasps, beetles, and other insects, have preceded this work. Dodd, Mead & Co. will publish the book.

Miss Nora Heald has recently been appointed dramatic critic of the Daily Mail. This is said to be the first time that a woman has held such a position on the staff of a London daily newspaper. Miss Heald is one of two clever sisters of the late Ivan Heald, a well-known British humorist who was killed during the war.

A "Portrait of George Moore in a Study of His Work" has been written by John Freeman and was published by the Appletons last week. Mr. Freeman is one of the most prominent of the younger English poets, and has been a winner of the Hawthornden prize. He has succeeded in this study of George Moore in presenting a combination of biography and literary estimate which makes altogether delightful reading and which forms a clear estimate of the Irish novelist and his works. George Moore's life has been picturesque and his tendency towards reminiscence affords a biographer a wealth of material. Mr. Freeman proves himself a discerning student of the man and work, and the portrait is a complete one, from the Irish childhood, through French student years, through the days in London, the contact with famous men and women, and with such movements as the Celtic Revival. The value of the volume is enhanced by the bibliography of the works of George Moore, compiled by Mr. Henry Danielson, and the list of values of the Moore editions.

Apropos of the large sales that are blessing the publication of Mr. Kennan's "Life of Harriman," an English weekly says: "It is a curious fact that English readers take little interest in biographies of successful business men. One remembers half a dozen books of the sort which have been reviewed all right and yet have not sold. There was even the case of a memoir of that remarkable creature of South African mining, Barney Barnato. In America it seems to be different, for a New York publisher who is in London just now says that a life of Harriman, the railroad builder, is having a really large circulation. Possibly this may partly be accounted for by the fact that Mr. George Kennan, who once exposed the atrocities of Siberian penal servitude, has written it."

Thomas Burke, the author of "Limehouse Nights," has a new London book of yarns ready for publication. Mr. Burke has been invited by Charlie Chaplin to visit the screen comedian in Los Angeles. Mr. Burke reports that he would like to accept, but can not. "It is," says Mr. Burke, "the hardest thing in the world for me to make a short railway journey at home." The prospect of a week at sea and another week trans-America makes Mr. Burke shudder with apprehension.

Adventures Magazine has selected Arthur D. Howden Smith, war correspondent, lecturer, historian, author of "The Doom Trail" (Brentano's), as one of nine men to take charge of the exploring expedition to be conducted in conjunction with the forthcoming

An interesting little story attaches to "Marie Chappellaine," the French-Canadian story published some time ago by Macmillan. Two Canadian men of letters, Sir Andrew Mac Phail of Montreal and Mr. W. H. Blake of Toronto, decided jointly to translate Louis Hémon's story into English. To this end they divided it between them, chapter by chapter, but when they compared their translations they found they would not join. One rendering held closely to Hémon's French text, while the other gave it a free rendering. The consequence is that there are two good English translations of a very good book.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Kiel and Jutland.

It is a novel experience to read a book in which the term "enemy" refers to the Allied nations of the late war. The novelty may be enjoyed by reading "Kiel and Jutland," by the German commander Georg von Hase, first gunnery officer of the Derfflinger. This remarkable book, which is translated by Arthur Chambers and F. A. Holt, and published by the eminent English house of Skeffington and by our American publishers, E. P. Dutton & Co., shows how far we have come from the heated propaganda days of the war. Commander von Hase's book is written as a defense of the German nation. Theoretically its popularity should be a test of the validity of peace and of our present neutrality; actually, it is hard to approach the book with an unbiased mind. Nevertheless "Kiel and Jutland" has its historic interest. It would be important if for no other reason than that it furnishes the bona fide German attitude. We have been told by travelers in the Teutonic countries that the Germans consider themselves a wronged and maligned people. Commander von Hase bears out the statement. He says: "In relating events from my old professional days my aim is to do something towards filling young Germany with the same pride in our Fatherland which inspired us grown-ups before we had to draw our sword against a world of enemies. It was with that proud feeling that we were in no way inferior to any nation upon earth that we fought during four long years and stepped from victory to victory until we finally collapsed when men of our own race, essentially un-German, knocked our weapons out of our hands in the moment of betrayal." Truly, an impassioned appeal which should stir all hearts!

"Kiel and Jutland" is divided into two parts; the first being devoted to a history of "Kiel Week," which the Germans and the English celebrated amicably together in June, 1914, just before the outbreak of the European war and during which the murder at Serajevo occurred. The second part is a German history of the battle of Skagerrak, where Von Hase "had the good fortune to be in the thickest of the fight, to take a personal part in every phase of the action, and thus played a decisive part in the destruction of the two English battle-cruisers, Queen Mary and Invincible."

The Love-Story of Allette Brunton.

The eternally interesting problem of divorce and the eternally monotonous triangle motif are the bases of "The Love-Story of Allette Brunton," by Gilbert Frankau. The chief difference between this novel and most of its genre is that Mr. Frankau has written it as a sincere plea for divorce. His argument for divorce as an inevitable attending evil of our civilization is unanswerable on the case he presents. And doubtless his representation of present-day English society is authentic. Devotees of realistic problem novels will enjoy "The Love-Story of Allette Brunton," as it is well written and has the legal variety of verisimilitude without which a novel on divorce would be sadly lacking in atmosphere.

A Short History of American Literature.

A very valuable and incidentally inexpensive handbook of American literature has recently been edited by Messrs. Trent, Erskine, Sherman and Van Doren. It is based on the reliable "Cambridge History of American Literature," but is compactly issued in one volume and with special reference to the needs of college students. However, it is an admirable reference work for any one not possessed of the longer four-volume "Cambridge History." The editors of both works are the same.

Three Juvenile Books

Among Little, Brown & Co.'s attractive juvenile publications are the two boys' books, "Ted and the Telephone," by Sara Ware Bassett, and "Drake and the Adventurers' Cup," by Isabel Hornibrook. The former of these is volume three in the Invention Series. "Drake and the Adventurers' Cup" is the fourth volume about Lanny Drake, boy scout, whose career at Maunsert Academy is chronicled in the present volume.

"Plays for School and Camp," by Katharine Lord, is a solution of the class play problem. The six plays here reproduced are all within the acting and producing scope of the average group of youngsters, though two of them have been professionally produced in New York. The collection should prove a boon to teachers looking for plays of simple settings and suitable material.

Piston clearances /

4/1000 of an inch when cold

1/1000 of an inch under fire

An automobile engine having a 4" bore will have when cold a clearance between its pistons and cylinders of approximately 4/1000 of an inch. When the same engine has been heated to operating temperature, this clearance will have decreased 75%, or to 1/1000 of an inch.

Likewise, a main crankshaft bearing having a clearance of about 1 1/2/1000 of an inch when cold, will show a decrease in this clearance at operating temperature to less than 1/2/1000 of an inch.

All oils lose viscosity, that is, they become lighter in body when subjected to the heat of engine operation.

An analysis of Zerolene shows that the differences in its body at the various engine temperatures, from cold to operating temperature, follow in close relation the decrease in bearing clearances.

The right body at all operating temperatures

For this reason Zerolene oils have at all engine temperatures exactly the required body to splash and flow freely into the fast-moving, small-clearance bearings to provide an adequate film of lubricant.

Because of their "oiliness," Zerolene oils cling to bearing surfaces, and at the same time offer in themselves a minimum of resistance to the engine power going to the driving wheels. For this reason they give perfect lubrication and permit the development of the maximum power, speed and gasoline mileage of the car.

Mr. and Mrs. Newlywed, in fitting up their apartment, will do well to scrutinize closely the furniture they buy, and especially any carpets "made in Germany," says the New York Tribune. It is reported that many carpets coming from Germany are made of paper and the imitation is so perfect that it is difficult to detect it. A great number of so-called leather objects are also, it appears, made of compressed paper, and the public takes it for real leather because it has its color and grain; moreover, most of these articles have been impregnated with a chemical product which gives the odor of leather. Nor is that all. Many neckties of "knitted silk" are in reality paper, and the German chemists have succeeded in imparting to them the softness of silk, so that at a distance one is easily deceived. Germany also manufactures a linoleum which is a paper composition treated with creosote. Apparently, paper is still plentiful and cheap, in spite of the amount used for money.

It has been estimated that in the forty years from 1880 to 1920 the annual value of American farm products increased from $44 to $185 per capita. Some of this rise is, of course, due to the falling value of money.

ELSIE AND HER GANG.

Some girl, that Elsie! Any girl that can capture the public as Elsie Janis has, with her fresh, spirited, delightfully individualistic comedy, has accomplished a feat. For ten years, at least, she has been a great favorite. And her service as an entertainer to the soldier boys during the war did the rest. We found then that she is the real article, and when she comes out and "makes a little talk," preceding the show, the fact is again demonstrated. Elsie is all wool and a yard wide.

One of the most delightful of human traits is that sense of genuineness that Elsie Janis conveys. I have never seen the comedienne anywhere except on the stage, but I know, I feel absolutely certain, that off it, in spite of the success she has made of her life, in spite of the frightful tendency of human nature to swell-headedness that follows success, Elsie Janis is too busily engaged working, observing, recording, and playing to be too much engrossed with herself. She has the observant eye, the mind that retains, the face, the voice, the slender, wiry, graceful, naturally dancing body that express. In fact, Elsie Janis has actually succeeded in introducing artistry in musical comedy, for she herself is an artist.

Let me see, what do they call the show? I have to pause and look at my programme. Just "Elsie Janis and Her Gang," the piece being a sequence of vivid impressions strung on the frailest of connecting threads.

But that doesn't make any difference, for the impressions are very vivid. The show begins conventionally, with an array of "eight bobs"—eight bobbed little, young, smiling fledglings all of a size. They are the regular thing, but neither Elsie nor her gang are.

The gang consists of fourteen young men who are not at all of the chorus man stripe. They look different. In fact, like Elsie, they give you a strong impression of being the real article. They are, the majority of them, tall, fine, husky, athletic-looking chaps. They sing well, carry themselves well, can toss off a comedy stunt, a chorus, a dance, any old thing that's asked for, in first-rate style, and one sees at a glance that they are sure to carry flapper scalps by the hundred; more than is good for them.

The piece is full of pretty little snatches of haunting sentiment set to the sweetest, most wistful of tunes. Elsie Janis' voice is small—she makes a joke or so about it—or else she has a cold, but whatever she sings she endues with art. She is, of course, the central motive, but she gives the others plenty of stage centre, especially Gus Shy, a human cork whose humor is as irrepressibly effervescent as his dancing, which has a quality of amazement, it is so incredibly light, swift, sure, and instinctively witty. Yes, Gus can be witty with his balancing muscles and his thews and sinews as well as with his tongue.

One comedian will assure a musical comedy of success, and here we have this born humorist backing up the queen bee in her busy hive of artistically created impressions.

Elsie Janis is the kind of player who stamps herself on the consciousness so deeply that as I write I can hear the soft, humorous, ingratiating voice, and see the big blue flash of her rolling eyes that occasionally comes as startlingly, when she is making her point, as the sudden white flash of an alternating beacon on a lighthouse.

The most remarkable effect she achieved was as Mimi in the Montmartre scene, in which she gave her tour de force, depicting Mimi as a Normandy girl who has become a sort of queen of the Apache group that consorts in a low, thievish dive. Chester Grady, an athletic six-footer of a handsome countenance, played the dandy, the kingpin of the group, and made a striking figure. But the song that Elsie Janis sang, depicting her thralldom to the pitying young American chivalry who would rescue her from her slavery, was a gamut of emotions and really most beautifully executed. She sang it in extremely creditable French, and when she relapsed into English in the scene her suggestion of Frenchness of character and speech was excellently done.

As a variant to the submissive Mimi, held in the ages-old spell of yearning love to her master, was the previous picture of the spunky young bride, spilling a lot of beans when she faces the possibility of her bridegroom having a past.

Then there were quantities of other taking scenes; eighteen all told, every one of them leaving some kind of aftermath; reminiscent laughter, or delight in Jerrien Thayer's sweet, haunting voice, or pleasure in dancing that was professional skill plus natural effervescence; or an occasional flash of drama.

And Elsie Janis, it seems, has worked up the whole thing, collected the "gang," trained them in their specialties, written the plotless but eminently entertaining, untitled framework of the show, and is the core and centre of the whole affair. It—the show—is sui generis, and so is the company; leaving out the "eight bobs," who have the usual musical-comedy choral qualifications; pretty faces, pretty smiles, pretty teeth, pretty legs, flat, childish voices.

Although in her preliminary address Elsie Janis deprecates the idea that their show is expensively gotten up in regard to costumes and scenery, there are a number of ingenious and highly entertaining novelties in the show which contain the element of surprise, while several of the sets, notably those of Honey-moon Cottage and the Kingdom of Discontent have more than a flavor of poetic beauty.

San Franciscans, by the way, will enjoy Elsie Janis' very clever impersonation of Ethel Barrymore's characteristically drawling, throaty utterance, having seen that fascinating lady so lately—and there were others; notably one of Sam Bernard.

Miss Janis expresses, in a note on the programme, her gratitude to Messrs. Finck, Simon, and Ivan for supplying the music to several of the numbers, but it seems that this versatile humorist is responsible for some of it, the sum total of impressions leaving us with the conviction that though she is versatile she can shine brilliantly in every specialty she undertakes.

AMERICANIZING FRENCH PLAYS.

Ever since Margaret Anglin's last season in San Francisco, when she played "Lady Windermere's Fan," "The Trial of Joan of Arc," and "The Woman of Bronze," she has been having a prolonged and financially successful tour with the latter play.

It is by Kistemaekers, the Belgian playwright, who is something of a melodramatist. Miss Anglin had the original play, "La Rivale," altered to suit American standards, and as it now stands it is theatrically effective, but totally devoid of the acute psychology which Bataille develops in all of his plays.

It would not be surprising if Henry Miller had the success of "The Woman of Bronze" in mind when he chose the Bataille play, and hoped to parallel its financial success. He has with "La Tendresse" a much profounder exploration into the depths of human nature to work on than was the case with "The Woman of Bronze," yet perhaps the very meretriciousness of the situations in that play, and a certain sensationalism of treatment, caused its success.

At any rate it yielded Miss Anglin her financial thews and sinews when she occasionally refreshed herself with a representation of the historical Joan of Arc piece, or with a return to her favorite Greek drama.

"The Woman of Bronze," however, is now slated for a vacation, or, perhaps, permanent retirement, Miss Anglin having sailed for Greece, probably to rest her wearied soul by the contemplation of the pure and noble lines of Grecian architecture, and perhaps to cull an impression or two which will bear fruit in future representations of the Greek tragedies.

In the meantime we shall follow with keen interest the future fortunes of the Bataille play. It has situations totally foreign to American ideas: that, for instance, in which Barnac wrestles with his grief after the parting from his faithless mistress, regarded, meanwhile, with the deepest, most respectful sympathy by his two friends; all three men long past their youth.

It would be next to impossible to parallel the situation in an American play. Imagine any famous American author—Barnac was a famous author—accepting the sympathy, under similar circumstances, of his compassionate friends. Or take some prominent business man, or a hard-headed scenario writer, and imagine them wearing the willow for a faithless love. No man in America would be allowed to witness that especial brand of grief except a newspaper reporter, who would be granted his immemorial right to make copy and capital of it.

But San Francisco audiences accepted the enchanting Marthe, in spite of her temperamental irregularities. So now it remains to be seen how New Yorkers will take to her.

I don't believe that all of our innocent American auditors fully grasped the meaning of that scene, in the extremely French and intensely interesting second act; the one, I mean, with young D'Abincourt; a scene which served as a sidelight upon Marthe's character, so gayly warmed and lighted by the mere joy of living.

The handsome, ingenuous boy served as a passing lure. Marthe, French to the fingertips, tasted the fugitive joy of that encounter; tasted it fully, and then the youth was gracefully relegated to the limbo of forgotten things; for the moment; for there were other fish to fry.

Ruth Chatterton is not an actress of strong self-consciousness, and therefore the real meaning of the encounter was not fully developed as it would have been on the French stage, gracefully and prettily though the scene was presented.

For I find that I do not agree with those who have accepted Marthe as a semi-conventional figure of the drama. There is nothing whatsoever conventional about Marthe; not even her dalliances in the primrose path; for Bataille does not do things that way.

LE VOYAGE DE M. PERRICHON.

The spring season of La Gaité Française, our local French theatre, which is cherished as a proud possession both by its French and its American clientèle, ended with five gala performances of the ever-famous Labiche comedy. I call them gala performances because of the unusually large attendance at each representation, and because of the fresh and hilarious enjoyment of the overflowing audiences.

"Le Voyage de M. Perrichon," long established as a classic because of the genial philosophy of life underlying its large and tolerant humor, as well as its wholesome gayety, has never lost its hold on French theatre-goers, so amusingly and gayly does it make a comedy presentation of the foibles of human vanity. It still receives periodic representation at the Comédie Française on some of those regular occasions when it is recognized that the famous classics, serious or otherwise, are due to have their turn.

It is a play that is always read and studied by students of French, and hence Americans in the delightfully responsive audiences at La Gaité Française enjoyed with hilarity scenes and situations that, for the first time, they experienced the delight of seeing enacted on the stage.

Which, viewed in conjunction with the success of the two Molière pieces recently presented at this theatre, would seem to indicate that regular revivals of the more famous French classics are apt to receive enthusiastic support both from the Franco-American and American patrons of La Gaité Française.

The comedy was presented with spirit and zest by the French company, M. Ferrier taking the lead with an amusing characterization of Papa Perrichon that abounded with the spirit of lively burlesque, the other players adhering more closely to the conception of a group of the prosperous bourgeoisie out for a sedate but enjoyable holiday. The two young suitors were very satisfactorily represented, M. Frediani's amiable romanticism of style making due contrast to the roguishly shrewd

Defeating the Drought

San Francisco's water supply must be brought from semi-arid regions at some distance from the City.

It is necessary, for safety, to store sufficient water to satisfy the City's demands for three years, without replenishment to the reservoirs from rainfall during this period.

The Spring Valley system has been built up in response to this necessity.

During the past four years a protracted drought made conditions very trying for this company which is charged with the administration of your water supply.

Storage of water was greatly depleted.

All the storage is in the San Mateo or peninsular branch of the system.

The peninsular storage reservoirs could be kept full, drought or no drought, if more water could be impounded in the Alameda branch and there were more pipe-line capacity to bring it to the peninsular storage reservoirs.

That is to say, increasing the height of Calaveras Dam in southern Alameda County so as to about double all of the present available storage capacity of the system, and building a new aqueduct from the Alameda branch to Crystal Springs Reservoir in San Mateo County, would prevent a series of dry years from endangering the supply.

This work is now under way as the result of a decision of the Railroad Commission, the unanimous action of the Board of Supervisors, and the cooperation of this company.

knowledge of life so aptly conveyed by M. Puttaert. Miss Madeleine Gray gave a suitably conventional representation of a Labiche "jeune fille bien élevée," and Miss Laurence Péchin, departing from the foolish conception of the mother of a girl of twenty looking sixty, presented an animated impersonation of Perrichon's commonsensical wife, making her a comely matron of the prosperous bourgeoisie.

Other members of the company did good work, R. Mercier making something of a hit as the physically imposing commandant, and M. Fallon and Gustave Lechten competently rounding out the cast of principals.

La Gaité Française will not reopen until October, M. and Mme. Ferrier, accompanied by a few young players, having planned a trip to Mexico, where they will give both concerts and plays in French. They will depart, however, with the agreeable consciousness of having had a very successful wind-up to their season, and of having attracted quite distinguished company to the theatre at the final representation; for several eminent artists were there who are to figure in the Stanford Stadium operatic festival, and people also recognized the familiar features of Governor Stephens and his wife.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Tigers with a Taste for China.

A British official writes in the Asia Magazine: "Once during my residence as a government officer in the Malay Peninsula I was watching coolies clearing the jungle for a house that was being built on a hill just above mine. Suddenly I heard an unusual hubbub, and, looking up, saw a black panther loping away with a Chinaman in his mouth. Chinese coolies could seldom be brought to believe in the reality of dangers from animals that they looked on as only cats of abnormal dimensions. I saw this valor of ignorance tragically illustrated one day when I took some police out to help me track a tiger responsible for the loss of many lives. From a too distant eminence we soon caught sight of a Chinaman, slowly strolling along, sucking a piece of sugar-cane. Out sprang the tiger, but missed his mark, the back of the man's head. Without any acceleration of pace, the coolie, merely withdrawing the cane from his mouth, waved at the tiger and 'shished' him away. The whole manœuvre took a second, and the tiger disappeared. Concealed in the jungle, however, he silently followed alongside the path and, round a farther turn of this zigzag road, he made another and more accurate spring, and, carrying the Chinaman with him, vanished once more. "At a certain place where a gang was assembled for work, a man-eater used to take a Chinaman each evening after dark from almost the same spot. This continued for some time. Learning of it, the superintendent of police, Captain Syers, our great shikari, dressed as a Chinaman and nightly patrolled the road. Malays laughed, saying, 'Of course the tiger knows all about it.' They believed that the tiger possessed supernatural intelligence. And it certainly seemed that he did, for after many nights without sleep, the sportsman, who had never had the slightest indication of a tiger's presence, gave up and went home. The evening of his departure that tiger carried off another Chinaman from the same spot."

A new light is thrown on the ancient controversy regarding the home of the Indo-Europeans by Harold H. Bender's study, recently published by the Princeton University Press. The author is professor of Indo-Germanic philology at Princeton, and the solution offered in "The Home of the Indo-Europeans" is a linguistic one.

The Columbia Theatre.

"Mr. Pim Passes By" will be seen at the Columbia Theatre, Monday, June 19th, for a limited engagement. This is the first Milne comedy to come to San Francisco, and is accounted the best. It is presented here by A. L. Erlanger with the entire original New York company, headed by Laura Hope Crews as Olivia. Associated with Miss Crewes in the leading rôles are Dudley Digges as George Marden, Erskine Sanford as Mr. Pim, Leonard Mudie as Brian, Alison Bradshaw as Dinah, Augusta Haviland as Lady Marden, and Madeline Barr as Anne.

There are no problems in "Mr. Pim Passes By." It is just good fun. The story of the play concerns the casual visit of the elderly and forgetful Mr. Pim to the quiet Marden household in England. A chance remark he makes spreads consternation, for it would indicate that the delightful Olivia Marden was a bigamist, much to the horror of her eminently respectable husband, George Marden. In the end it appears that Mr. Pim had made a mistake, but the complications that ensued enabled the matchmaking Olivia to obtain her husband's consent to the marriage of her niece to a rising young artist. "Mr. Pim Passes By" is in three acts, with the scenes laid in the English country home of George Marden on a day in July. Its success has been far out of the ordinary. Seldom has so thoroughly entertaining a comedy been set before delighted theatre-goers.

Elsie Janis and her gang continue at the Columbia next week.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Singer's Midgets are a circus, an extravaganza, an athletic exhibition, and a fashion parade all in one, presented by thirty diminutive men and women, whose height ranges from twenty-eight to thirty-nine inches and whose weight runs from twenty-eight to sixty pounds. They are assisted in turn by three elephants, twenty-two ponies, one midget lion, three deer, thirty dogs, four monkeys, one pig, one midget donkey, three canary birds, and a clever "sleeve" Pekingese. Ned Wayburn, director of musical spectacles, staged the production, while Joseph Urban, first of scenic artists in America, designed and executed the elaborate settings.

Grace Nelson is an American-made prima donna who has an abundance of stage presence and a gracious personality. She sings with ease and grace with a voice of wide range and bell-like clearness.

"Salvo" is a simultaneous discharge of artillery. Savo is the artilleryman who sets off this particular salvo and the charge is screams. To state the case simply, Jimmy Savo, assisted by Joan Franza, presents "A Salvo of Screams." He is a droll, eccentric comedian.

Niobe is an attractive young woman who, in her glass aquarium, disports herself with a flock of fish, doing many things under water which they can't even attempt. Her voice is quite audible in all parts of the theatre, though she is submerged. No mechanical device or illusion is employed in this exhibition.

George Barr McCutcheon's story, "Anderson Crow, Detective," was one of the best sellers, and through Jack ("Rube") Clifford, Crow is becoming a stage favorite. Mr. Clifford is a character actor who specializes in "rube" types. His Station Agent in "Jasper Junction" was a high light in rural characterization and his portrayal of Anderson Crow, detective, is as good a piece of character acting.

Lola and Senia are as fine a pair of dance artists as the Orpheum has seen in many a day. Trained in the continental schools of Europe, their work is the height of artistry with all the fire and passion of the Russian dancer.

Paul Decker and his company in their comedy "I Heard!!!" will remain for a second week.

Professor Wilde Hart delivered in London the other day a lecture on the redrawing of the maps of Europe and took the occasion to relate some delightful anecdotes, which testified to the almost incredible ignorance of the experts who played the part of amateur diplomats at the Entente conferences. Thus he told how an English personality of high rank, in the course of a conference of the Allies, in all earnestness advised the Italian delegates to export to England large quantities of bananas as a means of raising the rate of foreign exchange. Another of these wise men could not be convinced that Danzig was not in the Mediterranean. One of the members of the English commission in Upper Silesia, Professor Hart declared, was appointed to this office because of his knowledge of the Greek and Turkish languages. "They probably assumed," the lecturer explained, "that Upper Silesia was situated in Asia Minor."

Existing coal mines in this country can produce from 700,000,000 to 900,000,000 tons a year.

THE STEEL WORKERS' DAY.

In addressing the stockholders of the United States Steel Corporation at the last annual meeting Judge Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the board, made this statement on the subject of the working day:

"I think I ought to refer briefly to the twelve-hour-day question. As always, this has been a very difficult one. As you know, it has been our policy for years to eliminate long hours, long turns, and the seven-day week. The seven-day week was discontinued long since, and the fact published. In the early part of 1921 we had entirely eliminated the long turn, which occurred at the time shifts were made. Between October, 1920, and March, 1922, we reduced the twelve-hour men from 32 per cent. of the workmen to 14 per cent. Those 14 per cent. of course were engaged in what is termed continuous operations, where it was necessary to keep the machinery going uninterruptedly. There is no other practicable way.

"We would like and hope to eliminate all of the twelve-hour-day work if practicable. In the first place we meet the opposition of the men themselves, who wish to work longer hours in order to make larger compensation. I have stated before in discussing this question that twelve hours means twelve hours a day on duty, not twelve hours continuous work. About six hours only of the twelve the men are actually engaged in work.

"You may remember that the committee of five stockholders, appointed on the motion of a stockholder several years ago, in their final report stated that while they would like to see various things done away with, including the twelve-hour day, they realized it would not be practicable or possible 'for any one employer or any number of employers to inaugurate a shorter hour system unless a similar policy should be adopted by all employers in the same industry.' The reason is obvious: If one employer or a number of employers should offer employees a limited number of hours, less than twelve hours, and other employers in the same line offered their workmen the opportunity of working twelve hours, so that larger earnings would be received, the men would leave the mills or the furnaces of lesser hours and engage with competitors who offered longer hours.

"Many of the highest officials of our corporation and subsidiary companies work twelve hours a day, and some of them more than twelve hours. They are not harmed by doing it; they do it because they feel their responsibility and they want to do the very best possible for the stockholders of their respective companies. And we believe the general public is perfectly willing that the officers should work as many hours a day as they please."

Nightfall in Africa.

It was a weird and isolated place, that escarpment, and as I sat watching the sun slowly sink towards the rim of the mountain range beyond the Rift Valley I became aware of a strange thing, says Llewelyn Powys in the North American Review. It was as though all Africa at that enchanted hour was under some curious influence, as if it waited expectantly with indrawn breath for this half of the earth's globe to turn itself once again towards the spangled darkness of ultimate space.

With the coming of the night the whole air became vibrant, quivering, palpitating. From innumerable minute scaly throats a song of praise rose to the creator of the world. In shrill and high tones that fantastical chorus throbbed and hummed against my ear drum. Now and again far above my head would sound the romantic alien call of some wild fowl winging its solitary way through the night. I waited and waited.

A damp air, chilling and invisible, rose from the lake. It had about it the smell of thousands of unrecorded years that had passed in quiet procession over these remote waters, while century after century trees grew to their prime and rotted to water-logged decay, while century after century the bones of fabulous equatorial animals accumulated upon the slimy mud of the lake's bottom. It had about it the smell of water-pythons, of incredible crustacea, and of the fecund spawn of insects.

Then suddenly, loud and clear, breaking in upon the stillness of that wide moonlit stretch of water till every flag and every reed seemed to tremble, sounded the harsh note of a hungry leopard.

Actors and Statesmen.

Our early Presidents were friends of the actors, and corresponded with them as well as with the playwrights, says Montrose J. Moses in the North American Review. One reaches the conclusion that never, since the 'seventies or 'eighties, has the playhouse in America been so closely in touch with the social life of the people. I like to run through Washington's expense book to measure how frequently he bought tickets for the play; I enjoy the correspondence between John Adams and our polemical dramatist, Mrs. Mercy Warren; did not John Quincy Adams carry on a spirited debate with James H. Hackett, of Falstaff fame, regarding the plays of Shakespeare? It was a known thing in those days for legislatures to adjourn that an actor might be seen by the lawmakers. The romance of the play in America, therefore, is the romance of America in the making.

For the first time since 1914 there has been a decrease in the amount of tobacco consumed in France.

GATO GOSSIP

Is it or is it not?

What's all this talk about "mild Havana," "all Havana filler," "Havana blend," and so forth? Nice little phrases, true; but what do they mean?

A cigar is either clear Havana or it's something else. There aren't many Clear Havana cigars on the market, because it costs money to use Pure Havana tobacco for wrapper as well as filler.

Gato is one of the few that is made of 100% Havana tobacco inside and out,—filler, wrapper and everything. That's why we say,

If you want a Clear Havana don't buy a near Havana

Nancy Langhorne, Viscountess Astor, M. P., has been interviewed on a railway train, and the opinions thereby extracted have been duly published in the Philadelphia Public Ledger. It may seem a bit old-fashioned not to have interviewed her on an aeroplane, but she has not yet reached that speed. Lady Astor warns us against a feminized America, and express disesteem for women's political parties. Probably this will disappoint those yearning hearts that looked to her as the banner-bearer of women in politics as women, but so it is. She declares that while there will always be a difference in the masculine and feminine ways of looking at things, the different views must be brought to some sort of common soft focus if cooperation and harmony are not to be altogether lost. "Men need women," she says, "in politics as much as they do in the home. No man can live alone without holes coming in his socks and his buttons dropping off." That is true, and to the point. How it is going to darn the perforated sock and replace the departed button to have the women, whose immemorial service such darning and replacing are, sitting in legislative halls passing laws or attempted laws to regulate the conduct of their husbands it is difficult for a mere man to understand. Of course, we do not expect all women to inhabit the halls of legislation, unless those halls are enlarged; there are many who will stay at home and darn and knit and wash and sew on buttons. But if all women that wish to enter on the troubled ways of politics were to do so, a good many more "gallus" buttons would fall on our sidewalks than we see there at present.

Lady Astor disapproves of sex legislation by women, or by men either—meaning thereby legislation in favor of either sex, we may suppose. See what men have made of it, she says—look at the troubles of a man-governed world with its man-made laws. When you think of it, it is rather a mess. But Lady Astor approves the idea of a women's lobby at Washington, as urged clamantly, early and late, by Congresswoman Robertson of Oklahoma. One wonders how we are to enjoy the blessings of a women's lobby without a women's party, and how, if we have a women's lobby, we are to enjoy the continuous security of asexual legislation. Fortunately, not all things must be understood at once, and time will probably supply some sort of answer to these problems, good or bad. But the hope of having them settled by Lady Astor is disappointed. She only raises them. Neither does she believe in women using the wiles of sex for political purposes. They will never, she believes, bring purity into politics as long as they dress in such a way as to call attention mainly to their physical charms. Very well. If women are going to go about the corridors and lobbies looking like frumps, we shall stay out of Congress. We had about decided to anyhow. Let them take the old thing and run it. The business garb of American women she finds will not do at all politically. "I wouldn't have lasted a year," she said, "if I had gone into the House of Commons dressed like many a woman I see going to business over here. I was the feminist on trial. To underdress or overdress would have let down all others. I solved the delicate problem by wearing a most inconspicuous but becoming black tailored suit, with patch pockets to catch my notes. With it a simple white blouse, or, on warm days when I remove my coat, a sort of black satin smock with white muslin collar and cuffs."

Newport is promised another brilliant season, and those that have lost sleep for fear it had lost prestige, may make their minds easy and begin to take their normal repose once more. It is said that President Harding may drop in, on the Mayflower, if he doesn't go to Alaska, and while a mere President may not cause much of a flurry, there are those that have felt since the up-coming of Southampton that every little bit helps. The indications are for the best Newport season since pre-war days. Practically all the cottages will be opened, and many are open now, early as it is. Mrs. Elisha Dyer has already opened Wayside, on Bellevue Avenue, while Mrs. T. Shaw Safe will be at Ocean Lawn next week. Mr. and Mrs. James B. Duke of New York have leased from Mrs. L. Lothrop Ames her property on Bellevue Avenue extending to the Cliffs. Commodore Elbridge T. Gerry and Miss Angelica Gerry arrived at Seaverge last week, while Mr. and Mrs. William F. Whitehouse have occupied Stone Villa, opposite the Casino.

Among others who have already opened their houses are Mr. T. Suffern Tailor, Mr. and Mrs. Marsden J. Berry, Mr. and Mrs. James S. Cushman, Dr. and Mrs. Roderick Terry, Mr. and Mrs. B. H. Ripley, and former Ambassador and Mrs. James W. Gerard, the latter having leased Fairlawn, the Bellevue Avenue home of Miss Evelyn Burden. Mr. and Mrs. J. Woodward Haven of New York have leased the Bellevue Avenue residence of Mrs. Frederick S. Grand d'Hauteville for the summer. With all these, and many more, it is felt that the American social capital will be secure, for some seasons at least. No one need feel apprehensive for the price of Newport real estate just yet.

If the Parisian arbiters of fashion are to have their way, the studies of man in feminine anatomy will be diverted from shins to shoulder blades, and from the bronchial tube and thorax to the vertebrae down about as far as the latitude of the kidneys. The patella will be hidden, but the omoplate, or scapula, will be revealed in all its bony angles, nosings, and contours. So, at least, we interpret the latest dispatches from the theatre of the war of styles. Gowns are to be cut high in front, almost to the chin. The anterior aspect of the torso will be concealed, inasmuch as man is supposed to have gazed on it until it has nothing more to teach him, and the masculine attention will now be called to the other view. Girls with knobby knees will find comfort in the new ukase, but not those with sharp shoulder blades—also those with razor shins. Unfortunately, such handicaps are usually the possessions of the same persons; while the woman with rounding contours has advantages as unfair as they are unfailling. To her it matters not at all which end of the anatomy is hidden, as long as some of it is kept on view. Her main fear is that fashion should suddenly decree that all of it be covered. In that case her advantage, or as a railroad traffic man would put it, her preferential, would be so reduced as not to be very much worth having. She might even have to resort for the restoration of her superior charms to the cultivation of her intellectual nature, or even of a sweet disposition.

The German universities have always been essentially conservative institutions, says Charles B. Dyar in the North American Review. The same professors are lecturing to the German students today who instilled the ideals of Imperial Germany into the youth before the war. The same professors are teaching in the universities of Republican Germany who defended and extolled the policies and methods of the Imperial German government and military authorities. On the occasion of a recent celebration of the anniversary of the battle of Tannenberg the degree of LL. D. was conferred upon General Ludendorff by the University of Königsberg. The diploma celebrates Ludendorff as the "Master of Generalship, the Liberator who freed our East Prussian soil from the plundering and burning Russian hordes, the Hero who protected with the sharp blows of his undefeated sword the German people, surrounded by a whole world of rapacious enemies, until it trusted in false words and forsook its unbroken army and its strong leaders." In the high schools and academies the majority of the instructors are still reactionary.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A Scot came down an Edinburgh street on a Sunday morning smiling and humming a tune. "Have a care, mon, have a care," warned his friend. "Ye'd better mind what ye'r about. Ye look a'most as happy as though it was Monday."

In one of the dormitories of a well-known Eastern college for women two young house-maids were comparing notes on academic life. "Well," said the prettier of the two, contentedly, "the faculty has the brains and the college girls has the clo'es, but believe me, the maids has the looks!"

A Scot met another who was laughing. Concerned for his health or his sanity, the first Scot asked: "Sandy, whut makes ye look sae happy the day?" "Eh, mon," said Sandy, "I dreamt I was in Heevin. There was seven-and-thirty pipers a' playin' deerfunt tunes in ane sma' room. Mon, it was just graund!"

The sergeant was having a hard time with a particularly green lot of recruits. They were quite charmed when he stopped drilling and began to reminisce. "When I was a little boy," said the sergeant grimly, "I had a set of wooden soldiers. One day they disappeared and I was heart-broken till my mother said, 'Never mind, son. Some day you'll find your wooden soldiers again.' And believe me, you bunch of wooden-head block-heads, that day has come."

Chief Stone of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers was discussing government ownership. "Government ownership," he said, "certainly got a black eye during the world war. The way governments ran the railroads and other things was a caution. And yet all these governments were as conceited over their work as the chap who was asked if he believed in heredity. 'Do I believe in heredity?' he chortled. 'You bet I do! Why, I've got three of the brightest children you ever saw.'"

Jones often played with the youngsters in the community back yard of the apartment house. One Sunday morning Mrs. Jones answered a timid knock at the door and found a boy about four years old looking eagerly up at her. "May your boy come down and play ball with us?" he anxiously asked. "Why, I have no little boy!" said Mrs. Jones. "There he is," cried the youngster, pointing to Jones, who had just come to the door. And added to the master of the house, "I guess you can't come today."

A traveler who believed himself to be the sole survivor of a shipwreck on a cannibal island hid for days in terror of his life. Dodging from pillar to post he ran into a clump of bushes from which a thin wisp of smoke was rising. His knees knocked together and he lost his breath. Just as he was gathering his remaining strength to flee a voice from the clump remarked, "Why in hell did you play that card?" The "sole" survivor dropped to his knees and devoutly cried, "Thank God, they are Christians!"

Brown invariably came home late Saturday night very much lit up. The wife's method of coping with the situation was a broomstick and violent abuse. A soft-hearted friend suggested to her that kindness might work where violence did not. The following Saturday Mrs. Brown met her erring spouse with, "You are late, dear. But I have supper waiting. Come in and make yourself comfortable." Brown reeled in, winking significantly. "Go as far as you like, dearie," he mumbled, "I'll get hell when I get home, anyway."

There are many aspects to international marriages, particularly when they are deemed misalliances by one side or the other. In the early 'eighties an American millionaire named Skinner married a beautiful French girl of the cream of the French aristocracy. When Mrs. Skinner would go shopping in Paris and the shop assistant would ask her her name, she would haughtily answer: "By birth I am the Princess Clothilde de la Tour d'Ivoire. The footman will tell you my present name. I can not stoop to utter it myself."

Some time ago, runs a true story from Madrid, the telephone of the Military Club rang and the boy who answered it heard, "Will you be kind enough, sir, to call up for me, if you please, the manager of the club?" Now the Spanish are a courteous race, but the boy in charge was evidently not used to such excessive courtesy. He concluded that it was one of the other servants in the club and gayly answered, "Certainly, you big stuff! Wait till I call him." The manager came to the phone and immediately assumed a frightened albeit happy air. The groom became uneasy, but when he heard the manager utter the magic words, "Your majesty," he decamped entirely. When he showed up again it was to receive orders to go to the palace. Shaking with fear, he went for his unwished-for honor, an audience with the king. The latter reprimanded him, but concluded the audience with a hundred-peseta tip and returned the groom's telephonic compliment—"Yes, you big stuff. Wait till I call him." Strange to say, the young groom has resumed his post in the Military Club and has even risen in rank. He is head groom by the king's request.

The editor of the Smalltown Bugle, like many of his brethren, experiences considerable difficulty in persuading his subscribers to come forward, from time to time, with the annual subscription price. "If it is agreeable to you," he finally wrote to one hardened delinquent, "I will accept two bushels of corn in payment of the amount you owe me." "I regret to say," responded Farmer Brown, in due course, "that in feeding my stock I have used all the corn I raised." "Dear Mr. Brown," began the next letter of the series, "inasmuch as you have used all your corn, I presume you have a large supply of corn cobs on hand, and I would be glad to accept a load thereof in payment of the amount due from you, as I can use them in place of kindling wood." "Mr. Editor," replied the farmer by the next mail, "your letter has been received and contents noted. What I want to know is this—what in Sam Hill do you think I'd want with your paper, if I had a supply of cobs to use in kindling fires?"

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Wireless Widow.

I've been a widow all my life;
That is, since I have been a wife.
Communing with myself, the time,
In solitary pantomime.

Golf claimed him almost every day,
And, as he nibbled on his way,
I followed in his gallery
Or, on the clubhouse porch, drank tea.

At night, Bridge took him from my side;
I couldn't play it—though I tried;
But sat at home, with ill-content,
The while we gambled with the rent.

He gave up both. Said he: "I'm through,
I'll stay at home alone with you."
But Radio's got him. Fickle men!
And I'm a Widow once again.

—George Mitchell in Judge.

Talking 'Round the World Made Easy.

Derby, England, will soon have the largest telephone repeater station in the world, and even the United States will not be able to show anything like it.

This station is to contain more than 1500 thermionic valves. Thermionic valves are those magical wonders which have revolutionized telephonic communication and made long-distance telephoning so simple. The valve is something like an ordinary electric light bulb in appearance and everything it does goes on inside the bulb. Only by the glow it gives will the operators be able to tell if it is working satisfactorily. Already it has reached a stage when speech between London and any European country can be made as easy as it is now difficult, excepting perhaps Brussels and Paris.

All the main underground telephone cables from London to the north pass through Derby. Here in the repeater station the voice sounds, gradually giving out by distance, will be picked up, amplified, and retransmitted with the same strength at which they were originally spoken. As the number of underground cables increases so other repeater stations will have to be built. Every sixty miles is considered to be the ideal distance between repeater stations.

The average annual crop damage in the United States over a period of eleven years, from causes beyond the farmer's control, was $2,620,000,000.

Oxygen was first isolated in 1774, by Joseph Priestly.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

Social Notes.

Miss Elizabeth Schmiedell, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward G. Schmiedell, has announced her engagement to Mr. James Moffitt, son of Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Moffitt. The news of the betrothal comes as a surprise to the friends of the couple. The announcement was made at a luncheon given by Miss Elizabeth Schmiedell and Miss Doris Schmiedell at their home at Ross on Thursday of last week. The date for the wedding has not been set, but the marriage is to take place in October. At the luncheon the close friends of the Misses Schmiedell who were their guests were Mrs. Francis D. Langton, Mrs. Dearborn Clark, Mrs. Wakefield Baker, Mrs. Lawrence Fox, Mrs. Marshall Madison, Mrs. Kenneth McIntosh, Mrs. Frederick Hope Beaver, Mrs. Alfred de Ropp, Jr., Mrs. William Kent, Jr., Miss Jean Boyd, Miss Elizabeth Magee, Miss Aileen McIntosh, Miss Elizabeth Bliss, and Miss Veronica Byrnes.

The announcement of the engagement of Miss Helen Crawford and Dr. Lovell Langstroth was recently announced. The date for the wedding has been set for June 23d, and will be celebrated very quietly, only relatives and a few intimate friends being present. For the past five years Miss Crawford has been in New York engaged in social service work, having but recently returned to San Francisco.

Miss Jean Shiels, the second daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Wilson Shiels, was married to Mr. Sherman Hoelscher on Thursday, June 1st, at noon, at the Shiels home on Divisadero Street. Bishop William Ford Nichols read the marriage ceremony in the presence of the relatives of the two families. Miss Helen Jackson was Miss Shiels' maid of honor, Mr. William Shiels acting as best man for Mr. Hoelscher. On their return from their wedding tour Mr. and Mrs. Hoelscher will occupy an apartment they have taken on Washington and Divisadero Streets.

A wedding of last week was that of Miss Beatrice Austin and Major Robert Ross Welshner, which was celebrated at the home of the bride's parents in Sea Cliff. The ceremony was performed by the post chaplain of the Presidio, Rev. Peter Quinn, in the presence of relatives and intimate friends. Miss Mary Thomas was maid of honor for Miss Austin, and her bridesmaids were Miss Dorothy Leland and Miss Constance Behlow. Major William Vauban was best man for Major Welshner.

Miss Marie Welch, who is leaving soon for Europe with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Welch, was the honored guest at a luncheon given on Thursday, June 1st, by Miss Katherine Chase. On Wednesday Miss Virginia Murphy was guest of honor at a tea given by Miss Chase. Among the guests were Miss Katherine Boardman, Miss Dorothy Clark, Miss Jacqueline Valentine, Miss Jacqueline Keesling, Miss Betty Klink, Miss Jean Ward, Miss Frances Letterman, Miss Marie Welch, Miss Katherine Dorn, and Miss Florence Hellman.

For Miss Berenice Mitchell, who is to be married to Mr. Garton Keyston on June 10th, Miss Helen Brack entertained at a bridge-luncheon on Thursday. Among Miss Brack's guests were Mrs. Reed Funsten, Mrs. Otto Grau, Mrs. Ernest Maynard Smith, Mrs. Harold Snodgrass, Mrs. James Fagan, Miss Constance Luft of New York, Miss Sallie Obear, Miss Newell Bull, Miss Virginia Cumming, and Miss Doris Fagan.

At their country home at Atherton, Mr. and Mrs. Charles McCormick gave a buffet supper to friends spending the summer months in and around Menlo Park. Following the supper the guests spent the evening at cards and dancing in the ballroom. Those who were guests of Mr. and Mrs. McCormick were Mr. and Mrs. Augustus Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Lowery, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. Evan Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Roger Lapham, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Hooper, Mr. and Mrs. Frank King, Miss Edith Bull, Miss Marjorie Josselyn, Mr. Percy King, and Mr. Edwin Eddy.

Saturday afternoon at Menlo Park the finals for the choice of "Polly of the Circus" were held. Miss Louise Hahn, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. G. C. Hahn, was chosen for the honor. The contest in itself was a benefit for the institution for which the circus was given, netting over $5000 for the charity.

Miss Hélène de Latour entertained a house party of friends over the week-end at her country home at Rutherford. Among the guests were Miss Cecelia O'Connor, Miss Cornelia O'Connor, Miss Lillian Hopkins, Mr. Gordon Hitchcock, and Mr. Edward Pond.

General Charles Morton was host at a dinner party given recently at his home in Fort Mason. His guests included General and Mrs. Hunter Liggett, Commodore and Mrs. James H. Bull, Colonel and Mrs. Moor N. Falls, Colonel and Mrs. Gouverneur Packer, Major and Mrs. Ulysses S. Grant, Jr., Dr. and Mr. John Harold Philip, and Captain Henry Brickley.

Mrs. Andrew Welch, who is leaving soon for Europe, was the honored guest at a luncheon given last week by Mrs. Samuel Pond at her home on Scott Street.

Mrs. Terry Bull, wife of Major Bull, and Mrs. Joan Welch, wife of Captain Welch, were joint hostesses at a large bridge-tea given at Mrs. Bull's home on Union Street. During the afternoon about seventy-five of the friends of the two hostesses called.

Among those who are interested in the benefit for the Stanford Home for Convalescents (which is to take place in the form of a circus) and who have taken boxes for the occasion are Mr. and Mrs. Charles McCormick, Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer Fleishacker, Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Lowery, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Linforth, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Augustus Taylor, and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Donohoe. The seating capacity will be for 8000 persons, and the affair is to take place on the grounds of the A. G. C. Hahn place at Menlo.

Mrs. E. Walton Hedges, Jr., and her sister, Miss Caroline Maltby, were hostesses at a tea given for Miss Lorine Kinney in the garden of the Hotel St. Francis on Thursday, June 1st. Miss Kinney is to marry Captain Elon Abernathy on June 28th, and after spending two months in New York and Washington the couple will go to Panama, where Captain Abernathy is stationed.

To honor Mr. and Mrs. Grove P. Ayers, Captain Henry Scott entertained informally at dinner in the Fable Room of the Hotel St. Francis on Friday evening, June 2d.

Mr. and Mrs. Abraham Lincoln Brown had a small group for dinner in the Fable Room of the Hotel St. Francis on Saturday evening.

CURRENT VERSE.

Biftek Aux Champignons.

Mimi, do you remember—
Don't get behind your fan—
That morning in September
On the cliffs of Grand Manan;
Where to the shock of Fundy
The topmost harebells sway
'Campanula rotundifolia':
John: cf. Gray?)

On the pastures high and level,
That overlook the sea,
Where I wondered what the devil
Those little things could be
That Mimi stooped to gather,
As she strolled across the down,
And held her dress skirt rather—
Oh, now, you needn't frown.

For you know the dew was heavy,
And your boots, I know, were thin:
So a little extra brevity
In skirts was, sure, no sin.
Besides, who minds a cousin?
First, second, even third—
I've kissed 'em by the dozen,
And they never once demurred.

"If one's allowed to ask it,"
Quoth I, "ma belle cousine,
What have you in your basket?"
(Those baskets white and green
The brave Passamaquoddies
Weave out of scented grass,
And sell to tourist bodies
Who through Mt. Desert pass.)

You answered, slightly frowning,
"Put down your stupid book—
That everlasting Browning!—
And come and help me look.
Mushroom you spik him English,
I call him champignon:
I'll teach you to distinguish
The right kind from the wrong."

There was no fog on Fundy
That blue September day,
The west wind, for that one day,
Had swept it all away.
The lighthouse glasses twinkled,
The white gulls screamed and flew,
The merry sheep bells tinkled,
The merry breezes blew.

The bayberry aromatic,
The papery immortelles
(That give our grandma's attic
That sentimental smile,
Tied up in little brush-brooms)
Were sweet as new-mown hay,
While we went hunting mushrooms
That blue September day.

In each small juicy dimple
Where turf grew short and thick,
And nibbling teeth of simple
Sheep had browsed it to the quick;
Where roots or bits of rotten
Wood were strewn, we found a few Young buttons just begotten
Of morning sun and dew.

And you compared the shiny,
Soft, creamy skin, that hid
The gills so pink and tiny,
To your gloves of undressed kid,
While I averred the color
Of the gills, within their sheath,
Was like—but only duller—
The rosy palms beneath.

As thus we wandered, sporting
In idleness of mind,
There came a fearful snorting
And trampling close behind;
And, with a sudden plunge, I
Upset the basketful
Of those accursed fungi,
As you shrieked, "The bull! The bull!"

And then we clung together
And faced the enemy,
Which proved to be a wether
And scared much worse than we.
But while that startled mutton
Went scampering away,
The mushrooms—every button—
Had tumbled in the bay.

The basket had a cover,
The wind was blowing stiff,
And rolled that basket over
The edges of the cliff.
It bounced from crag to boulder;
It leaped and whirled in air,
But while you clutched my shoulder
I did not greatly care.

I tried to look as rueful
As though each mushroom there
Had been a priceless truffle,
But yet I did not care.
And ever since that Sunday
On the cliffs of Grandma Nan,
High over the surf of Fundy,
I've used the kind they can.

What Poetry Is Not.

Attitudes towards poetry are as various as its kinds. And the reader must have thought over these attitudes when he considered the problem of creating an audience or becoming part of one, says Jeannette Marks in the North American Review. Some excellent people, not ill-educated either, look upon poetry as one of the elegancies of life, withal a little superfluous. Others think poetry is sugar-water. It is, sometimes. So are some people, and there are no Federal laws for putting them out of the way. Some men and women regard poetry as sentimental nonsense. In that it might be said certain types of poetry are like any cross-section of human nature to be found anywhere. The most damaging of all attitudes that which holds that poetry is inimical to the facts of life and of science. Some poetry is. The greatest poetry, speaking the common speech of common human experience and love for nature, never is.

California has 99,617,280 acres of land, of which 18,418,643 are national forest, 20,239,977 are unappropriated public lands, 463,041 are Indian reservation, 745,798 are school lands, 4,555,941 are private timber holdings, and 27,931,444 are farms, with an approximately equal area classified as miscellaneous. Of the farm lands only 11,389,894 acres are improved, and of this but 3,893,000 are irrigated.

Booking Stowaways.

The Paris correspondent of the London Express says that amazing disclosures are expected when the French Parliament, on re-assembling, discusses a bill to make the penalties for stowaways more severe than they are at present.

There is already abundant evidence that there are "agents" in all the ports who "book" stowaways across the Atlantic. They have a widespread secret service which insures their patrons escaping detection on board ship and enables them to be smuggled on land at the other end. Last year they arranged the passages of more than 2000 stowaways.

The bill will attempt to close down these secret agencies at Havre and other ports where the voyagers, whose names do not appear on the passenger lists, book their passages—and pay for them.

In Havre, in a little narrow street not far from the Bassin du Roi, you will find numerous little drinking shops. Sometimes there are two in the same building, one on the ground floor and another upstairs. In one or two of these the agents are to be found. The only way to get in touch is through sailors, and after a few glasses of rum or tafia you will be told him to set about your enterprise.

The correct gambit to taking a "ticket" as a stowaway is to produce some money. How much just depends. But the price of stowaways passages, like everything else, has gone up, and it will be little use showing anything less than a hundred-franc note. There are several people to be "bought," the agent will tell you, and you will have to hand over the money to secure these priceless friendships, which will enable you to be franked across the Atlantic hidden from prying eyes, supplied with food and drink, and, what is even of greater importance, you will have your

"get-away" made safe for you on the other side.

There are several classes of travel. For 200 francs you can secure a fairly comfortable voyage, and you will have your choice of traveling in the luggage hold or among the coal bunkers. The latter "class" is not altogether despised because the griminess aids as a disguise when officers are on the prowl.

J. R. Kemp, Pacific Coast manager of the Miller Saw-Trimmer Company of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, died on May 25, 1922.

It is not generally known that Charles Dickens wrote a life of Christ for his children and left instructions forbidding its publication.

A jurymen petitioned the court to be excused. "I owe a man twenty-five dollars that I borrowed, and as he is leaving town today for some years I want to catch him before he gets to his train and pay him the money," he said. "You are excused," the judge answered in a very cold voice. "I don't want anybody on the jury who can lie like you."—Boston Post.

An English newspaper is printing choice bits of broken English as overheard by its readers. Two examples follow, which are considered the most amusing: A coffee-room waiter, who said he was Swiss, replying to a guest ordering breakfast: "Tongue iss no more, shickken never vos. How you like your eggs voilt, tight or loose?" The other concerns an enraged Portuguese, who turned upon his opponent and spat out: "If I did know ze English for ze box, I would blow your nose, by damn, I am."—New York Evening Post.

The popular airedale is a terrier from the valley of the Aire, Bradford district of Yorks. Its name was first registered by the Kennel Club in 1886, replacing the earlier name of Bingley or broken-haired terrier.

Prohibition Logic.

Since the courts have held that the Congress may define the word "intoxicating," and have virtually determined that this definition need not correspond with the fact, says the Rev. John Cole McKim in the North American Review, the Anti-Saloon League must make the best of a power that is probably ephemeral, since it appears to be based upon balances of power in contested elections rather than upon the deliberate wishes of a majority of the American people. For if it be constitutional to define as intoxicating that which most of us believe to be non-intoxicating, it must be equally constitutional to define as non-intoxicating that which most people believe to be intoxicating (e. g., an alcoholic content of 90 per cent.).

Since the courts have acknowledged the adequacy of legislation specifying but one intoxicating ingredient, though the language of the Eighteenth Amendment applies equally to all, it seems clear that not more than one need be mentioned. It need not, then, have been alcohol. It might just as well have been an altogether different class of beverage outlawed at the dictation of an Anti-Caffeine League.

Nobles of the Shrine.

"Let's pretend," the children say, and life for them becomes something different, more to their liking, more interesting and dramatic. They are translated into another world, where they expand and grow faster than they can in the world of reality, and where, if their pretending is good, they take on unexpected powers. When the experience has brought them all the benefit it can, and they have in consequence grown tired of it, they come back to actual existence—or, as Barrie put it, "return to their distracted parents." But they are changed. Every excursion into the ideal is an advance. The excursions continue at intervals until the pressure of life forbids, until the little girls are too old for dolls, and the little boys no longer care to dig robbers' caves and kill imaginary Indians. But they never lose the desire to get away for awhile from the exactions of fact and live in a world of fancy where they are free and strong and brave, a world so created that care can not enter and the selfishness that nature seems to impose as a condition for getting on in this life is for a time forgotten. So for a week San Francisco has swarmed with pale Arabs speaking startling English; with nobles and potentates more gloriously garbed than Augustus Cæsar; and the air has been filled with cheerful greetings, with song and the music of bands. Bagdad was never like it—nor Mecca, nor Medina. If Mohammed could see it he would say: "I wouldn't have thought it possible!" There are men of Aad, Zagazig, Zemzem, Hella, Hillah, India, Arabia, Mocha, Mecca, Morocco, Tripoli, and all the rest of them. The city has given itself up to the impulse of play and the empery of the ideal. Of course, the weather has misbehaved and there has been a slight protraction of our Indian winter, but perhaps the hospitality of San Francisco has been the warmer for that. It has quite taken to its heart the marching men whose play is made doubly worth while by a spirit of general helpfulness and chivalry in an age which is not only no worse than any other age, but is probably the better able to appreciate helpfulness and chivalry for having just passed through a terrible war in defense of those priceless human attributes. These men call themselves nobles. There is no better way to be noble than to assume to be. The fact that the word does not now mean what it did when it was first used is a great gain. They claim nothing on the score of birth, or of privilege granted by some parasitic sovereign, but all for the merit of the man, appraised by the judgment of his peers. That means solidarity, order, sanctions made real in the effective disapproval of unworthy conduct, and in the fear of such disapproval. The Shrine is one of the great conserving forces of modern society. Long may it thrive, and travel about the country in silks and velvets, taking wherever it goes light and color and music and gayety and the spirit of play and fair play, and ideal impulses of fraternity and charity and magnanimity. It is a manifestation and an exercise of the ever-aspiring spirit of civilized man.

Executive Leadership.

Pleasing everybody the first time is a delightful exercise of the presidential office, and inasmuch as the incumbent of that office is a former newspaper man he ought to know just how it is done. Strange to say, President Harding is not doing it. The opposition is functioning beautifully, according to the tenets of the best political philosophers, and offering biting and sarcastic criticisms, first, because he has assumed national leadership in derogation of certain imaginary constitutional limitations; and second, because he has not.

These views are held by different members of the same party, and sometimes by the same member of that party at different times, according to the supposed temper of his audience, and the "set" of his morning's buckwheats and molasses. We have previously adverted to a certain rather authoritative critic who thought him censurable for drafting a pair of senators to represent us at the Disarmament Conference, because that was executive work and the aforesaid senators were members of the legislative branch of government. It did not matter to this critic that President Wilson's procedure in sending no senators at all to Versailles did so much to keep us out of the League of Nations. Under the Constitution, senators are not hired to do executive work, and that conjured up visions of the republic in ruins—in spite of the fact that to the Senate is entrusted a special bit of executive responsibility, in the ratification of any treaties that might be negotiated, and therefore it was wise to provide it in some first-hand way with first-hand information.

The current World's Work takes Mr. Harding to task because he seems too amiable to assert the dictatorship of his predecessor, Theodore Roosevelt, whose shade it raises with more mediumistic ease than Sir Arthur, Sir Oliver, and Sir William have ever acquired, working individually or combined, to reproach the President with having made an insufficient number of enemies. The great shade speaks as one accustomed to the uses of enmity, and expert in attracting it. In fact his passion for it appears immortal. In fictitious dialogue, President Harding says: "Do you mean I ought to go out deliberately to make enemies?" And the spirit of Roosevelt replies: "There won't be anything deliberate about it. All you've got to do is to assert your leadership of public affairs, and you'll enjoy the luxury at once."

Now comes the railroad dilemma, with its two sharp horns: labor at one end, rates at the other; and looming in the background the portentous necessity of service, a thing that will not be denied, for on it depends the country's weal or woe for the next ten years. And again is the President fishwisely berated for too much leadership because he endeavors to promote coördination between the two independent commissions. It is a sad inconsistency of censure, but very human of the outs.

Spencer taught us that progress was from homogeneity to heterogeneity, from the simple to the complex. But to keep the belly from eating up the legs, the organism requires a brain. We are evolving, with many organs, and members branching here and there. When two of the opposing functions try to boss the same job, trouble threatens; and here the leadership of the President is needed, and here it is often asserted—not timidly and hesitantly, but with firmness and decision. The railroad mess is a case in point.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has jurisdiction over rates. Under any sane plan of organization it would also have something to say about the costs of the service, which it is but human nature to try to bring into conformity with those rates so that there may be a margin of nutriment for the stockholders. But at this important end the railroad executives encounter the Railroad Labor Board, an entirely different body; which, no matter what its intentions may be, evidently needs some sort of liaison officer to keep it in touch with the commission. The commission must protect the revenues and earning capacity of the roads, but with the President's recently applied pressure to get rates down the only way out is through reductions of labor costs. Here the jurisdiction of the commission ceases and that of the board begins; so it becomes obvious that no governmental policy toward the carriers can be made effective without the coördination of these two agencies. Whichever trenches on the other's field issues an urgent invitation to disaster; and Congress in its wisdom provided no method for bringing the two into harmony.

Hence the President steps in. Perhaps Congress calculated that he would—but judging from past congressional performances we hardly think it. Both commissions are his subordinates. The Interstate Commerce Commission, being permitted to take cognizance only of existing wage scales and therefore existing labor costs, could not make very severe reductions in rates; and until quite recently the Wage Board has proceeded with much caution. So the President called in the railroad executives to suggest to them that they voluntarily reduce some basic rates below the level which the Interstate Commerce Commission might find to be reasonable, taking a chance of later wage reduction. Although it came to naught, for conditions are too dissimilar on different roads for horizontal reductions, and anything else was too intricate for what the New York World has sarcastically called "government by dining," yet the effort was an act of leadership, real and vital and necessary to the proper coördination of our public organs.

Meantime, rates have been reduced, and more wages have been reduced, but it was a rather hit-or-miss business. The Argonaut is credibly informed that President Harding will go before Congress in December with a request for sounder laws. For one thing, he will ask that the Railroad Labor Board, which now sits at Chicago, shall at least be brought to Washington, and it may be that he will go still farther and ask that its powers and duties be merged with those of the In-

Interstate Commerce Commission. That would be real leadership. The President sees the need of it, he is capable of exercising it, and he should have a defined legal basis for it, to relieve him of criticisms that are as silly and inconsistent as they are unjust.

Poison Ivy in the Melon Patch.

No one is likely to deny that a merchant marine is a "public utility." As a matter of fact, almost everything commercial is—shoe factory, hardware store, garage, towel service for the office. Most things that make money, and thereby survive the practical test of value, serve the public in some way and are "public utilities." Such exceptions as narcotic peddling, and motion-picture films that the censors will not pass, are not public utilities, to be sure, but neither are they a large part of our total volume of business. There is little to be gained by classifying some enterprises as public utilities, but if there were, we venture the opinion that a merchant marine would fall in that class. The head of the United States Shipping Board is therefore at the head of a great public utility, operated by government. He is a man of wide experience and wider observation in business—knows its nature and its requirements thoroughly. With such a searchlight he has been in a position to see government in business, operating a public utility; as some people in this state would like to see government operating or trying to operate the vast "utility" of water and power development. And this is what Chairman Lasker thinks of such projects:

My experience has caused me to realize, as I have never realized before, that government operation is as poison ivy in the garden of industry.

Through checks and balances required under government ownership, initiative on the part of the employees is in large measure killed or forbidden. That inspiration which comes through profit and the building for one's self for the future is utterly lacking. So, in the combined lack of initiative and inspiration, there is not created that vision which is necessary for permanent upbuilding. * * * Government ownership, while today satisfactory for immediate needs, is not building up for the future, and is overly costly at all times.

Mr. Lasker does not live in California, and no doubt is wholly ignorant of the proposed Water and Power Amendment. Yet if he had been discussing it he could not have made a clearer statement of the fallacy on which it rests. We do not know that he reads the Argonaut, yet he might have based that statement on Morton Todd's article in the Argonaut of June 10th. There was no previous agreement on the matter. One of these writers is a journalist looking at business and politics from the side lines, and endeavoring to judge without prejudice. The other is one of the country's greatest business men, and we doubt if he has any notion of elementary economics, because most business men have not. Yet the induction of a great business man in a high administrative office, passing his days in intimate contact with the nation's business troubles, supports the induction of the journalist who knows very little about business in detail; viz.: that government is, owing to its nature, unfit to carry on business and serve the public industrially as well as private initiative and individual effort can and do. To quote from the article in last week's Argonaut:

These drawbacks are largely in the nature of checks on the discretion of office-holders. The political sense of the public, derived from centuries of sad experience, compels it to withhold from government just the powers needed in business. This must be so. A government in which was vested the necessary power over the people's money to use it at discretion in the transactions of business would become an intolerable tyranny. And that is what the California Water and Power Amendment seeks to do—vest in an unknown board, to be appointed by an unknown governor, the right to dip into the state treasury at will, for any project helpful to its ambitions, and have the treasury replenished by limitless taxation.

That expresses the truth which Mr. Lasker has seen at Washington. There is nothing mysterious about it, nothing abstruse or esoteric. You don't need a mahatma to understand it, an Ali Rajah or a Mme. Ellis of the Exposition Zone, or a spook materialized by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, to help you see it. Go around the public offices and observe some of the deputies. Don't blame them; they are just human beings. Consider how little they have at stake, and how little incentive there is for them to do their work any better, or to invent any new devices for serving the public, or even to save the public's money, collected for them in such satisfying volume.

Think of trying to operate a net-work distribution system for electric energy, on which depends a large part of the manufacturing and agriculture of the state, by means of men whose environment and standards of days-work is that of the ordinary political appointee. The writer of this editorial was waiting recently to see the head of the engineering department of a great private corporation engaged in supplying public service, when there filed out eight or nine alert, quick-stepping young fellows a little past the age of college students. The head of the department said: "Those are my engineers—they're young, but they're smarter'n hell." Political clerks and deputies and assistants and bureau heads are appointed because they are smarter'n hell, but it usually consists in being smarter'n hell before election day. The rest of the time most of them work short shifts, and it takes many of them, illustrating the great and true Jeffersonian principle that "that government is best which governs least." And they are no worse than the general run of us. It is merely that they have little to gain or lose. Governmental bureaus everywhere are full of men with dead ambitions, getting nowhere, and doing as little as possible because there is nowhere to get—except on the payroll, and they are already there.

And now it is proposed to mortgage the state for half a billion dollars and turn over the money to an army of such functionaries, with such ambitions, prospects, and motives, to carry on one of the great basic industries of California. No, you can not beat it.

The Dervish of Daly City.

In such a crazy world, and one in which the facilities for finding out what it is for are so meagre, it is no wonder that from time to time some one becomes deranged and writes poetry; or even reverts to "nature" as a way of discovering the intention and plan of things. Otto Herlick of Daly City and points southward therefrom did both. Reverting to nature in such cases seems to consist in running around without any clothes, frightening people; and Mr. Herlick added the evidences of inspiration and divine command by entering a Greek restaurant with his poems under his arm and demolishing the dishes with a club. We have seen some restaurants that seemed to call for such treatment, but have no information that this was one of them. In the intervals of smashing platters and cracking coffee cups Mr. Herlick proclaimed himself the "Poet of God." After the fracas, in which he felled four men and had to be shot by the nightwatchman, some of the poetry he had carried into battle was recovered and examined, but it did not appear to contain much more information than the more or less metrical statements of Carl Sandburg or Amy Lowell. The bullet-hole in the Poet of God was duly patched and he was committed to one of our state hospitals for the insane.

Individual reversion to nature is not an isolated phenomenon, but one that recurs in some form throughout the ages. It is supposed to be more frequent in hot countries than in polar or temperate regions, but may break out anywhere. We seldom hear of nature men in Iceland, Greenland, or other chilly regions, where the proximity of ice keeps the head cool and inspiration sufficiently in check to make clothing seem acceptable; but we have had them in the region of San Francisco before. There was the Blanket Man of Stanford University, who fled no one knew whither; and there was the Nature Man of the same academic halls, who went to Hawaii, was worshipped by some of the Portuguese of Hilo as the returned Lord, drifted down to Tahiti, and came back recently to this city to seek a wife and here to perish; perhaps of the air-tight garments he had long eschewed. But the parts of the world that seem most fertile in nature men are the sandy wastes of Asia Minor, Palestine, Arabia, and Northern Africa. Here arise dervishes, prophets, and mahdis, and while the vested interests in the things of the spirit are inclined to persecution, some of the nature men are well received and highly honored.

The trouble with the Prophet Herlick was that he arose in the wrong time and place. He might have attained great authority and a reputation for sanctity that would have persisted a thousand years had he gone mad in another age and clime; but Daly City is no place for a Poet of God. He may be needed there, but the people are not ready for him yet, and prefer to save their crockery and take a chance with their souls. In this they are neither unique nor startlingly modern. If they have cast out a prophet they have had ample precedent, just as they would have had if they had credited his delirium as a message from the Deity. And he was better treated than some nature men have been whose fame has lived for centuries.

It is said that this particular specimen has been seen off and on for more than a year, running the beaches and the brush near Mussel Rock, about ten miles down the coast, sometimes prowling in a vegetable patch, sometimes awesomely silhouetted against the evening sky, from the top of some jagged headland, with hair and beard streaming in the wind but with no other garments to speak of. We have in an old book an account of some of the Palestinian dervishes, which might describe him accurately. It was said that they spoke like angels, but acted like beasts—that as soon as they received their mission they ceased to wash—that they often resorted to the mountains, where they could be seen skipping from rock to rock like goats—or they lived in the desert on roots and wild honey, sometimes grazing if there were grass or browsing where the brush was good—that they taught in parables, and often acted the parable they taught. Some of the prophets of the Old Testament were, at least in outward aspect and demeanor, singularly like the prophet of Daly City. They were not always well received, and there were instances of barbarity in their treatment, although their fame has come down to this day. Urijah, for example, fled from King Jehoiakim into Egypt, but was pursued, brought back, and killed. Prophet Herlick would not have been so treated, his shooting having been more by necessity than choice and design. If he had fled southward and hidden himself among the artichokes of Pedro Valley, it is likely that he would still be at large, writing poetry and practicing dermal ventilation. The difference seems to be that in a primitive social condition insanity is regarded as a sign of divine inspiration, and hence a quality making one either blessed, or dangerous to vested interests, whereas nowadays and in this region it is only the rational that is so regarded or that receives such treatment.

We shall have more nature men from time to time, even in this cool climate. They will not be numerous enough nor of sufficiently contagious example to affect the clothing trade deleteriously, and so it will not be necessary to take violent measures with them. It is to be hoped they will not even have to be shot. But they must not break the dishes, and they must be careful not to put themselves in a position to be held responsible for rationality. Let them write their poems and keep away from editors and restaurants, and they will be comparatively safe. If they wish to be taken seriously they should go to the Soudan or some other vast and sandy region where there is so little business that people have time to think about their souls.

Real Restraint of Trade.

Not the Supreme Court, but the law, is to blame for the condition now menacing California and the Pacific Coast in the form of an order to unmerge the Southern and Central Pacific railroads. A statute is a crystallization and a petrification of human will at the time it is passed, and in the thirty-two years that have elapsed since the Sherman Act was signed there has been a total change of condition with which that act could not keep pace. There has also been a change of understanding on the part of many as to the interests of the public, and a change in the manner of securing to the public the thing in which it is interested, namely, service. Rates, services, extensions of line or expansion of plant, or whether any shall be built at all or not, and if they shall be, then the issues of bonds for construction, are all under the mandate of commissions. The interest of the public is, generally speaking, secure. In this case, however, its security is jeopardized by the operation of a law passed after the act complained of, and to terminate a condition which is now known to be beneficial.

The statement of President Sproule of the Southern Pacific makes these things very clear. It is a candid statement, and contains much matter that is pertinent and valuable. The public should understand its main propositions, because they are vital to the prosperity of this region. The Southern and the Central Pacific have been under common control for fifty years. They have been developed as one system, not two. Beginning at different times and under slightly different conditions, their financial arrangements were different, and when a new line was needed it was built by the one that could most easily raise the money at the time. Thus the system has been a mosaic, each bit related to those standing around it, but in many cases of small value alone. For example, many totally separated short lines of one road run from valley towns to points on the other, which form their only connection with one another and with terminals and the outside world. The line down the San Joaquin Valley was built to meet a public demand, but it was built by two companies—the Central Pacific to Goshen, the Southern Pacific beyond that point. The system is a unit, but unfortunately with two names. If it had but one the present trouble would never have arisen. See what names can do.

The fact of the common control of the two roads was given definite formal status by the lease of the Central Pacific to the Southern Pacific in 1885, five years before the passage of the Sherman Act. And the Southern Pacific has owned the entire stock of the Central Pacific since 1899. All the common development, says President Sproule, has taken place in response to public desire and with the approval of Congress—and the public's only interest in the manner of this development was in the question of whether it was being hurt by having the thing carried on by a single control with two names or with one. That is a hair-splitting matter.

If the unit system was recognized and established by the lease five years before the passage of the Sherman Act, and was then an innocent thing working beneficially for the extension of railroad lines and services and the upbuilding of the state, it is hard to see how that act could make it either very criminal or injurious to the people's interests. As a matter of fact, after the strain of war developed the weak spots in the nation's railroad equipment, it was seen that we needed another law to permit what in part the Sherman Act had forbidden. That act, passed to prevent the restraint of trade, was itself restraining trade. So the Transportation Act of 1920 was passed and signed, and it instructs the Interstate Commerce Commission to do what the railroads themselves would have done if they had been left to themselves: adopt a plan for the consolidation of the railroad properties of the United States into a limited number of systems. That is the lagging, dilatory, inconsistent, harmful, and, in the end, necessarily self-reversing way in which the mania for regulating everything by statute or ordinance often operates.

The suit against the roads under the Sherman Act was started in 1914. The decision is rendered in 1922. In the meantime, in 1920, the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to prepare plans for previously forbidden consolidations, and under the Transportation Act of 1920 it serves notice on all railroads to prepare for hearings; and in the tentative plans of the commission, the Central Pacific and Southern Pacific are logically and rationally treated as one system—which they are. Evidently the commission found no reason to believe that the present unit management was unduly restrictive of competition.

Inasmuch as the Transportation Act of 1920 was intended to undo part of the Sherman Act of 1890, it is possible that the Interstate Commerce Commission can by taking control undo the decision of 1922. But the support of public opinion is necessary. It should be known to the commission that more moderate counsels prevail today than in the time of universal railroad hatred, and that more intelligent views of the function of business are held than when the general supposition was that it was merely predatory. This is not a simple case of marriage and divorce. These properties are Siamese Twins, and it would be dangerous as well as needlessly expensive to cut them apart. Or, to take President Sproule's more vegetarian simile, "they have grown like a healthy tree from a common root into a single unit of service throughout half a century." To tear them apart would mean a new and real restraint of trade. So that the Sherman Act has to be reversed in order to prevent it from reversing itself by causing the thing it was passed to prevent. Another example of the wisdom of regulating everything by statute. It can't be done, except at vast public cost and damage.

It is a great thing that the Transportation Act of 1920 exists. But in our understanding of it, action under it lies pretty much in the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That commission undoubtedly knows the railroad situation in this country, and it is to be hoped that it will see its duty and do it. Some way must be found to prevent a real and monstrous restraint of trade by the Sherman Act, in large part a piece of intolerant meddling with the natural development of transportation and industry. President Sproule in his statement emphasizes what the Argonaut has been emphasizing ever since the decision: that the public has nothing to gain by the dissolution of the great transportation system of California, and the West. It would be destructive of the greatest single element of modern productivity—effective railroad service. The way to secure that is to recognize that we already have it, and to let well enough alone until we are sure we can make it better.

Toil, and Minimum Wages.

The war being waged on behalf of the union taxicab drivers in this city is really a war against the public and the welfare of society in general. Standing alone, it might be a small matter, but it does not stand alone. It is part of a larger and far more sinister whole; the persistent general effort, by fair means or foul, to make the public pay more than natural costs for any service or commodity in which labor is a considerable element. The game is, combine with employers and take it out of the public. Such a policy can only tend to beggar everybody, and the taxi strike is a good example of the way in which that is done.

Here is a public service of value, though perhaps not of vital necessity. We might get along without taxis in San Francisco, and under the present tariffs most of us do; but the business is a good illustration of the way a guaranteed minimum wage will work, whether in driving taxicabs or carrying on more important services. In other cities the drivers are to a certain extent profit sharers; they receive a percentage of the fares. The same system prevails on the London busses. The result is good public service at reasonable rates. The drivers are operating the capital of the company, but at a distance from any direct control, so that what that capital shall do in the public service is entirely in their hands. Under the commission plan it is to their interest to pick up all the fares they can, keep their cars going, and serve just as many people as possible.

In San Francisco the reverse is true. The drivers demanded a minimum wage of $5 a day. They got it whether they carried one passenger or none, whether they ran five miles or eighty-five. So, as driving is work, they did as little as might be, because they would not get any more for doing more. To get more for doing more is the condition of all progress in this world. Without the operation of that principle, little is done that can be avoided. How did it work in San Francisco? Why, the drivers did about a third of the work that is done by taxi drivers in the big cities of the East. They ran an average of forty miles, while a Chicago driver runs 110 to 120.

On such a small business the rates have to be high, for the capital is not earning what it should. A large part of the day the plant is "standing by" and the driver idle, and he thus costs 12 cents a taxi mile instead of 4 or 6 as in Eastern cities, where living is far more expensive and far more of a hardship for men whose work exposes them to the weather. If the driver got an order for a long haul, out of town for fifty or seventy-five miles, he was tempted to turn it over to an individual operator for a commission. Why should he work for the company any harder than he must? He got his pay anyhow. At the same time, the high rates necessitated by this system operated to keep the service, that is, the mileage, low; for riding in taxicabs is not compulsory, and when fares are exorbitant fewer persons indulge themselves in the luxury.

So we have had in San Francisco high fares and restricted taxicab service. We are not betraying the city to say so; the fact is notorious. It is the logical outcome of the minimum wage and the guaranteed job. The Argonaut printed a letter last week setting out this system in full. Against this condition, harmful to the public interest whether it prevails in the taxicab business or any other, the employing companies tried to set up the system of commissions on fares, which had formerly prevailed for ten years under the open shop condition. They offered a guaranteed minimum of $4.25, with a 25 per cent. commission on all business turned in. The union representatives said they preferred a minimum of $4.50 without commissions, and struck to get it.

That strike was against the public interest of San Francisco, just as much as the crimes that have been committed in furtherance of it have been against the public peace. It is high time these things were understood—that there are some points of union policy inimical to the public, and which the public must not tolerate. We are still of the opinion that the taxicab companies charge too much for their own and the public good, even under the circumstances. But if the allegations in the letter of the president of the California company to the Argonaut are true, the unions have supplied them with a good excuse. The public is always involved in these disputes, and the duty of its representatives is to enforce peace. When crime is resorted to, it is usually the wrong side that wins.

Editorial Notes.

A civil war veteran of Redding predicted long ago that he would die on the 10th of June, 1922, and fulfilled his prediction. That might support some theory of the occult and spooky, were it not for the fact that a great many thousand people predict their own deaths every year, but fail to die when they say they will.

Forty-nine out of 460, or more than 10½ per cent., of the employees in the registry department of the New York postoffice have been found to have crime records. That is an example of "letting the government do it." No doubt the case is not representative of the postoffice personnel—but do you happen to think of any private corporation in an important department of which the proportion of former criminals runs that high?

Some half-dollars are to be minted in commemoration of Rutherford B. Hayes. They will be quite serviceable. For those that do not remember who Rutherford B. Hayes was, we may say that he was a President of the United States in the dear, dead days of the low cost of living, and was chiefly remarkable for having beaten Samuel Tilden by so narrow a margin that many super-heated Democrats believe he was never elected at all. Mr. Tilden was a deserving gentleman who narrowly escaped being commemorated by half a dollar. He lives in the hearts of his partisans.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

On Solid Ground.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 8, 1922.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I heartily congratulate you on your editorials relative to the University of California in your issue of May 22d and June 3d. Such expression is greatly needed, and I am sure your views have the approval of each one who has the welfare of the university at heart. Those of us who have had our sons and daughters in the university know only too well of the conditions that have existed and what was being taught by some of the "economists" and "professors." In the short time that Dr. Barrows has been president he has demonstrated he not only knows what is needed, but is thoroughly capable of effecting such reforms or reorganizations as may be necessary, if he is given the authority and properly supported. If your surmise is correct as to the cause of his resignation, then all the more reason that if the university desires to send out into the world true Americans, in spirit as well as in action, a man of Dr. Barrows' type is absolutely essential. I deem it fortunate that just at this time Dr. Barrows is in the Sierra and out of reach of ordinary communication, otherwise I am afraid he would be one of the first to say "Nay" to you in the articles you are writing, but I sincerely trust you will keep up your good work. I have heard many expressions of regret at his resignation, and know it is the wish of thousands that he could be induced to reconsider it and be kept at the head of the university—the interests of which are far greater than the personal wishes of any man, whether he occupies a place on the Board of Regents or not. Sincerely, T. M. SHEARMAN.

An Approving Word from a "House-Mother."

SAN FRANCISCO, May 31, 1922.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I was very interested in your article on the resignation of Dr. Barrows. One is so thankful to find some one who will dare to speak the truth; and every word you said concerning Berkeley was true. As a house-mother for a long time in a sorority in one of the best-known universities in the country, I heartily endorse everything you said in regard to the disadvantages of co-education. Your suggestion as to the affiliation of Mills with U. C. was excellent, for unless something along that line is done, the reputation of California as a college of reputable standing is doomed. From the unenviable notoriety it has achieved in the last few years, I'm afraid the regents will not find it easy to fill Dr. Barrows' place. With grateful thanks for your fearlessness in speaking your mind. E. F. M.

Unfriendly foreigners are boycotted in Tien-tsin, China, by the "Chiu Kuo Kuei K'u Tuan" Society, or literally "Save Country Kneel and Weep Society." The object of the society is to identify shops and business houses that persist in buying goods from unfriendly foreign nations. When such a shop is discovered, the society calls its members, who meet before the door of the shop in question and kneel down and weep in order to move the shopkeeper. This is continued until the latter is convinced that he should purchase no more goods from unfriendly nations.

VOICES FROM THE PRESS.

IN IOWA.
(New York Times.)

The agricultural bloc is justified in exalting its horn. The railway roasters at Washington are happy. The old leaven of Grangerism is still strong in Iowa. Group government gets one more servant in the Senate. Three or four senators who imagine themselves to be "Progressives" or "progressives" have curiously discovered a "progressive" triumph in Colonel Brookhart's success. What is there progressive in the substitution of class-represented government for representative government? Are gratuities to soldiers something new? Is unjust and unproductive taxation progressive?

Colonel Brookhart's radicalism was testified to memorably by the Conference for Progressive Political Action, which sent a letter to Iowa voters approving his candidacy. Among the officers of that conference are officers of the Farmer-Labor Party, of the National Non-Partisan League, of the United Mine Workers, of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, and our own Frederic C. Howe and Morris Hillquit. These gentlemen are something more than progressive. Colonel Brookhart is not their kind of radical; and it is possible enough that he will be less radical in Washington than he has been in Iowa.

Be that as it may, the pretense that the nomination of Mr. Beveridge and of Mr. Pinchot was "a rebuke to the Administration" and a progressive victory is ridiculous. Mr. Pinchot was nominated as a regular Republican on purely state issues. He had nothing whatever to say about national politics. Mr. Beveridge is in some respects a strong "reactionary." He denounced blocs. He denounced the Adamson and the Sherman law. He didn't try to coddle the farmer or the workingman. He advocated the sales tax. He showed the economic folly of high excess profit taxes. He talked, in fact, like a statesman and a trained economist, not like the ardent rhetorician of his earlier period.

IN PENNSYLVANIA.
(Washington Star.)

A forest of interrogation points has sprung up overnight in Pennsylvania. Take a few.

Will a Pinchot machine succeed the Penrose machine? Can politics in Pennsylvania be conducted without a machine? Is Pinchot enough of a politician to handle a machine in a state where machine work for so long a time has been essential to success? If Mr. Pinchot attempts machine work and fails, what will be the effect on the Republican stronghold in 1924?

In the governor's chair Mr. Pinchot will need an organization—a machine if you please—and it must be responsive to his will. He must work with it and through it to accomplish his ends.

Organization work is no more necessary in Pennsylvania than elsewhere. As a matter of fact, it is necessary everywhere. No progress can be made without it. Calling it machine work does not discredit it in the eyes of practical men.

Mr. Pinchot is known principally for his interest in forestry. Strictly speaking, he has not been considered a politician. But for years he was intimately associated with a master politician, and must have learned something of the game from him. Theodore Roosevelt knew politics thoroughly, and imparted to all who were associated with him some of his knowledge and inspired them with some of his spirit. Mr. Pinchot, we may all be sure, is more than an authority on forestry.

If Pennsylvania is in doubt in 1924 the Republicans would do well to order their grave clothes. A funeral, with their party at the head of the procession, will be a certainty. If the keystone becomes insecure, the arch will inevitably tumble. Nothing will suffice to save it.

GREAT BRITAIN EMERGING.
(Baltimore American.)

Another of the encouraging signs of the return of stability in the money market is the steady upward climb of the British pound sterling, which has just attained the height of $4.48, or 38 cents below par value. The pound dropped as low as $3.18 at one time. This was in February, 1920. It has been climbing ever since, despite unemployment in England, the more or less general stagnation of business, and the slow recovery of continental European finance.

It is said to have surprised New York financial circles that Britain would be ready this fall to pay $100,000,000 interest obligations to this government. However, if we ignore the somewhat mysterious British financial recovery under very adverse conditions, there should be no surprise in a further rapid advance of British financial stability this summer, as reports indicate that the internal trade prospects are good and the British manufacturers are already embarking on rather ambitious selling plans. The trade tone throughout the island seems to be one of optimism and the newspapers speak confidently of the future.

All this is of good import, for while the world waits on Russia and Germany to restabilize their financial systems, the active embarkation of the Western nations in solidifying the exchange rates and in paying their bills will have whole-some effect on the general situation.

DIPLOMATIC INDISCRETIONS.
(Washington Post.)

The free and constant expression of public opinion in the United States is a temptation to foreign envoys. They discover that public opinion is a more potent agent in this country, swaying the decisions of Congress and the government. Yet this public opinion seems to be easily affected by rumors, facts, and personal expressions of opinion. The press is open to all, and everybody reads. Any one who has something important or sensational to say can usually find a public audience. There is no censorship. No one stands guard over the press. The tastes of newspapers differ. If one newspaper will not print an article, another will.

Another misleading feature of American life is the easy mingling of all kinds of individuals and the universal relish of jocular and witty utterances. A foreigner who wins a reputation for wit or fun becomes immensely popular and is widely quoted. A tradition grows around him, attributing to him greater powers of wit than he ever possessed. This was the case with Wu Ting-fang, who discovered that his slightest utterance, seriously intended, caused Americans to burst into roars of laughter. They detected in everything he said something droll, subtle, and Oriental, and each individual flattered himself upon his intellectual alertness in detecting the true meaning of the Oriental's remarks. One result of this public attitude toward Wu Ting-fang was his astonishing boldness in commenting upon American affairs and in interfering in American politics. He thought nothing of communicating directly with members of Congress on matters affecting China. When the Department of State hinted that his activity was irregular he blandly laid the blame upon his inability to understand Occidental affairs, and he was always excused.

The welcome extended to the utterances of foreign envoys in the press, and the free and easy attitude of the public toward distinguished foreigners, have often tempted diplomats to make efforts to sway public opinion in the American fashion. These efforts are usually inoffensive, and if the envoy has gained personal popularity the public is even likely to encourage him in his attempts to gain advantages for his country. But it is a dangerous proceeding, for Americans quickly resent importunate propaganda and will seek in a way to offset the undue activity of foreigners in their affairs.

Personal utterances by diplomatic envoys are always subject to adverse criticism if they have any appearance of deliberate interference with domestic politics or policies. Another foreign activity, however, is not so obvious, and its interference is not so easily checked. This is "propaganda"—an elastic word covering many phases of attempted political influence. The material put forth by the propaganda agencies of foreign governments is formidable in quantity and protean in shape. It is all directed for one purpose—the swaying of American public opinion, which is counted upon to sway the government.

The Ladies of St. James's.

The ladies of St. James's
Go swinging to the play;
Their footmen run before them,
With a "Stand by! Clear the way!"
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
She takes her buckled shoon,
When we go out a-courting
Beneath the harvest moon.

The ladies of St. James's
Wear satin on their backs;
They sit all night at Ombre,
With candles all of wax:
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
She dons her russet gown,
And runs to gather May dew
Before the world is down.

The ladies of St. James's!
They are so fine and fair,
You'd think a box of essences
Was broken in the air:
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
The breath of heath and furze
When breezes blow at morning,
Is not so fresh as hers.

The ladies of St. James's!
They're painted to the eyes;
Their white it stays for ever
Their red it never dies;
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
Her color comes and goes;
It trembles to a lily,
It wavers to a rose.

The ladies of St. James's!
You scarce can understand
The half of all their speeches,
Their phrases are so grand:
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
Her shy and simple words
Are clear as after rain-drops
The music of the birds.

The ladies of St. James's!
They have their fits and freaks;
They smile on you—for seconds,
They frown on you—for weeks:
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
Come either storm or shine,
From Shrove-tide unto Shrove-tide,
Is always true—and mine.

My Phyllida! my Phyllida!
I care not though they heap
The hearts of all St. James's,
And give me all to keep;
I care not whose the beauties
Of all the world may be,
For Phyllida—for Phyllida
Is all the world to me!

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Miss Joyce Wethered is Britain's new woman open golf champion. She recently defeated Miss Cecil Leitch, the title-holder, in the British Classic Women's Tournament at Sandwich.

Former Senator George Sutherland, who is a close personal friend and advisor of the President, is to attend The Hague Conference of international experts on Russian affairs this month. His errand is said to be that of counselor for the United States in the case with Norway over ships pending before The Hague Tribunal.

Mrs. Brian-Garfield, the French wife of an American engineer, who is house surgeon at the Paris Charity Hospital, has advanced arguments why women make good surgeons, though they are not eminently successful as physicians. Medicine, she claims, depends upon deduction, but surgery merely requires great skill with the fingers, and women's fingers are hereditarily adept with scissors and needle. Mrs. Brian-Garfield is said already to rival the veteran men surgeons at her hospital.

Colonel Samson Lane Faison, United States infantry, was recently named by President Harding for promotion to the rank of brigadier-general in the regular army. Colonel Faison will succeed Brigadier-General William R. Sage, who died June 4th. During the world war Colonel Faison, who held the temporary rank of brigadier-general, commanded the Thirtieth Division at Camp Sevier during training and the Sixtieth Infantry Brigade of that division during its active operations in France.

It has been lately published in a local paper that many of our wealthiest Americans have had either one son or none at all. Rockefeller has one son. Carnegie had none. Ford has one son. Frick had only one son. Baker had one son. Schwab has no children. Mellon (Secretary of the Treasury) has one son. J. P. Morgan had only one son. Schiff had one son. Vincent Astor is an only son. Gary has no son. Armour has no son. Wilson (the packer) has only one son. Patterson has only one son. Eastman is a bachelor.

Five new peers were created on the occasion of the king's birthday, June 4th, for conspicuous public services. They are Sir Robert Hudson Borwick, who throughout the war provided hospital treatment for sick and wounded colonial officers; Sir Joseph Robinson, "for national and imperial services"; Sir William Vestey, who "rendered immense service during the war in connection with the food supply and cold storage arrangements"; Sir Samuel J. Waring, who equipped and maintained a hospital during the war, and Sir Archibald Williamson. These men are baronets and will be raised to barons.

Sir Philip Sassoon, whose engagement to Miss Megan Lloyd George has been rumored, is the third baronet of his name and the parliamentary secretary to the prime minister. Sir Philip has been M. P. for the Hythe division of Kent since 1912. He was private secretary to Field Marshal Sir Douglas Haig, commander-in-chief of the British armies in France, from 1915 to 1918. Sir Philip won many honors during the war. He was made an officer of the Order of the Black Star, a chevalier of the Legion of Honor, an officer of the Order of the Crown of Belgium, and has been decorated with French and Belgian military crosses. Sir Philip is thirty-three years old.

Sir Walter A. Raleigh, distinguished professor of English literature at Oxford University, whose death occurred several weeks ago, was born in Scotland in 1861, the son of Dr. Alexander Raleigh. After graduation from Cambridge, where he had been president of the Union, he was appointed a lecturer on the then newly-organized University Extension Scheme. The substance of his early lectures was incorporated in "The English Novel," one of the liveliest of literary text-books. Among Raleigh's other critical studies are "R. L. Stevenson," "Style," "Wordsworth," and a study on Milton. He was called to occupy the chair at Oxford in 1904, after having held similar lectureships at Glasgow and Liverpool. Of late years he was constantly in demand as a writer of appreciative introductions to literary reprints. His work was distinguished for its rare combination of erudition and imagination.

Arthur F. Mathews, San Francisco mural painter, was awarded the fine arts gold medal of the American Institute of Architects at its Chicago convention. Mathews, who is well known for his landscape work, is also recognized by the award as the leading mural decorative artist in the United States, John Singer Sargent being the other painter considered for the honor. In his student days in Paris, where he worked at the Julien Academy and in the private studio of Bolanger, Mathews was considered the finest American draughtsman sent to Paris. Much of his work was destroyed in 1906 by the fire. Among his notable recent work are his panels at the Children's Hospital, Carnegie Library, Mechanics' Institute, and Masonic Temple of this city, and the twelve panels in the rotunda of the State Capitol, depicting scenes of California history. Mathews was for many years director of the Hopkins Art Institute. He is at present at work on a series of fifteen panels for the library of the University of California.

There are persons so moderate and non-committal in their views that if you ask them whether the Bay will ever be bridged they will answer: "Well, yes; and no."

CROWN PRINCE STILL WILLING.

Former Heir Apparent to the German Throne Appears in a Receptive Mood.

The Memoirs of the Crown Prince of Germany belong distinctly in the Frenchman's category of the things that are important if you think them so. The book has been liberally noticed in this country and Europe, and even served piecemeal, au syndicat, and reviewers have expended some conjecture as to the real authorship, apparently assuming that the prince would have had help as he had when he was a field commander. Perhaps he had. If it is a work of collaboration, we hazard the guess that those eminent Hearstian journalists, Snivel, Drivel, and Piffle, had a good deal to do with it. The Germanic sentimentalism is all through it—that emotional vapor which the Teuton can turn on at will, just as he puts caraway seeds in his mashed potatoes, and with which he can flavor a financial loss, the downfall of his empire, or a plate of kalter aufschnitt, deluding himself the while with the belief that he is deluding the rest of us. And for that reason the book has its significance at this time, when Germany appears to be rushing into bankruptcy to avoid her reparations payments, when discerning travelers report a strong monarchist trend, and when it might seem to the German mentality that plenty of sniffing would secure for the Fatherland an endless moratorium.

One looks in vain through these pages for a sign of repentance for the horrors of which the Bryce Commission found Germany guilty. There is no repudiation of such measures, no seeming consciousness of the fact that they were wrong. The word "atrocities" does not appear in its index, either for denial or defense. There is not even that quality of hypocrisy which might be accepted as a concession to decency. The German psychology runs true to form all through these simple annals, and the thing whiffles and sniffles along about the foe-girt nation, the victim of envy and hatred, quite in the old manner of national self-righteousness, but with the truculence reduced to a sub-calibre charge for indoor shooting. It is true that there is a trace of recognition of the unwisdom of German bad manners, but even in such passages as the following it gets around in the end to the old refrain of justification by jealousy:

But it was not alone envy of German efficiency that gained for us the aversion of the great majority; we had managed by less worthy qualities to make ourselves disliked. It is imprudent and tactless for individuals or peoples to push themselves forward with excessive noisiness in their efforts to get on; distrust, opposition, repulsion and enmity are thereby provoked. Yet it is into this fault that we Germans, both officially and personally, have lapsed only too often. The openly provocative and blustering deportment, the attitude adopted by many Germans abroad of continually wishing to teach everybody and to act as guardians to the whole world ruffled the nerves of other people. In conjunction with the stupidity and bad taste of a kindred character proceeding from leading personages and public officials at home and readily heard and caught up abroad, this conduct did immense damage, more especially, again, in the case of England, who felt herself particularly menaced by modern Germany.

That looks fair, in part. But when the subject of abdication and renunciation is approached one sees the special pleading of a man with a cause to save at any cost of sincerity and candor, and the old royal and imperial practice of saying one thing and meaning another. One can hardly read the final passages with any idea that either the Kaiser or his son meant anything when they retired from the "king business," other than to escape trouble, and obtain asylum until things looked favorable for a try at restoration.

However, there is much of interest in the book—pictures, impressions, of moving things and events. The Crown Prince was in a position to see some things the rest of us could not, and while we can not accept at par all his statements of them, they at least have a vivid aspect which makes them worth noticing. Here is a pre-war impression of the Czar and the Russian heir-apparent:

Tsar Nicholas was not, in my judgment, the personality that Russia needed on the throne. He lacked resolution and courage and was out of touch with his people. As a simple, country gentleman, he might perhaps have been happy and have had many friends; but he did not possess the qualities essential to lead a nation in the development of its capacities; possibly, indeed, his timid mind scarcely dared to reflect upon the merest shadow of such qualities.

Deeply tragical appeared to us, even at that time, the weakly and continually ailing little heir-apparent, Alexis Nicholaievitch. Though already nine years old, he was usually carried about like a little wounded creature by a giant of a sailor. With anxious and trembling tenderness, the parents clung to this fragile offspring of the later years of their wedlock who was expected some day to wear the imperial crown of Russia.

All over! Gone in blood and horror, this little wearily flickering life.

When it comes to the British, there is a certain obvious straining of compliment which suggests the process of snuggling up. In 1909 the ex-prince visited India, and gives us these sapient observations:

Of all the impressions I received the greatest and most lasting was that made upon me by the organizing and administrative talent of the English. It struck me, too, as a noticeable peculiarity that, in the various branches of administration, comparatively very young officials were employed, but that they were energetic and were invested with great independence and responsibility. Extensive and healthy decentralization prevailed generally. Everywhere I was impressed by the vast power of England, whose magnitude was, before the war, frequently and considerably undervalued in Germany, intoxicated as she was with her own rapid rise.

But it became just as clear to me how enormous was the competition which Germany created for the British in the emporiums of the Far East. Thus, many an English merchant told me, in confidential talk, that it could not go as it was—England could not and would not allow herself to be pushed to the wall by us. I myself, during the sea voyage, noticed that we met about as many German merchant vessels as British ones. Moreover, the muttered curse, "Those damned Germans!" occasionally reached my ear.

There is an effort to supply documentary evidence that the Kaiser was innocent of provoking war. The following passage is interesting at this point, and, favorably read, would seem to support the view that the Kaiser did not want war, or did not want it at just that particular moment when he made the annotation quoted. But much depends on how you read it, and whether or not you are in a mood to give it a favorable or an unfavorable interpretation:

On July 28, 1914, when Serbia has accepted almost all the points of the Austrian ultimatum, my father annotated thus the telegram which brought the news of Serbia's submission: "A brilliant performance within a limit of forty-eight hours. That is more than one could expect. A great moral success for Vienna; but with it disappears every reason for war, and the Austrian minister, Giesl, ought to have remained quietly at Belgrade. After that, I should never have ordered the mobilization." I quote this telegram and its marginal notes, because they prove irrefutably the peaceful desires of Germany and the Kaiser. They prove the good-will, in spite of which our destiny—bound to the policy of the Vienna Ballplatz to the extent of vassalage—strode its way.

The prince has little admiration for his father, but he seems to love Ludendorff with a filial affection, and after declaring that "his wealth of ideas and marvelously exact intellect solved with astounding certainty military problems of the most difficult character and won for him and for the German arms imperishable fame," he makes this noble effort to save the imperishable from perishing:

The successful designer of battles and calculator of victories, who, ever since he first led his first men as a little lieutenant, had been accustomed to regard the concepts of discipline, punctuality, and fighting courage as things of iron-like rigidity, the practiced strategist, who, ever since he first donned red-striped trousers as a young officer of the General Staff, had combined with the idea of a battery or a division definite striking values and calculable effects, now suddenly saw himself compelled to query all these notions. Enterprises which, assuming the reliability of the individual factors, bore every promise of success, broke down in the execution because the machine, partly overstrained and partly rusty, failed to perform its task. The last German attacks, i. e., from March 21, 1918, down to the decisive turning-point of the war—the irruption of the enemy at the Forest of Villers-Cotterets on July 18—were, notwithstanding some brilliant initial successes, nothing but a series of bitter examples of this fact.

And then, being in excellent position to do it, he puts in this word for his own military fame, anent the battle of the Marne, and the charges that he was answerable for the disastrous retreat ordered by the High Command—as though the High Command would have paid any attention to him:

What I intend to write here is not a description of the military developments and the operations of my Fifth Army in those bitter days; for that I have made other arrangements; I propose here only to sketch in broad outline the circumstances which, at that time, led the German army to desert from its victorious advance and to start a tragic retreat. The blame mine? Only mean malice could invent such an idea, only unbounded stupidity could believe it!

As commander-in-chief of the Fifth Army, I led the advance of my army in August, 1914; I saw the decisions and notices that were issued and was present at the scanty discussions with the General Higher Command and with the adjacent armies; finally, I had the best of opportunities to watch and study hour by hour the development of affairs during the battle of the Marne. My impression is that it was an unfortunate combination of many circumstances that led to this pernicious result. Besides the unquestionable incompetence and the consequent moral and physical collapse of General von Moltke, there was the unfortunate and rapidly discouraged leadership of the Second Army by General von Bülow, and the absolutely disastrous activity of an officer of the Headquarters Staff, who, oppressed by a sense of responsibility and personal pessimism, assumed a verbal order given to meet a particular emergency, as conferring full powers upon him, and so occasioned a retreat of the two victorious armies on the wings before a decision had been reached.

Whenever I think of the senseless and incomprehensible flinging away of the successes gained at that time, whenever all the horror of that insensate folly comes before me, I see the tragic figure of a man who ought to have led, but who was no leader, and who broke down when the rising pressure of events broke down the traditional scheme: that figure is the figure of Lieutenant-General von Moltke.

It takes a long time to analyze a battle, especially such a battle as that of the Marne, a battle that was a small war in itself. We believe the military men are not yet unanimous in their verdict on it; but it seems likely that the Germans were beaten there largely through a lack of intelligent objective on the parts of Von Kluck and Von Bülow after the retreat from the Sambre, of which lack the tactical brilliance of Joffre's generalship, assisted by the harassments of the Belgians, took advantage in a series of recurrent flank and frontal attacks which worked like an eight-day clock and disposed of one German element after another. If this view approximates the truth, it is hardly gracious to put the blame on poor Von Moltke in order to save the reputation of German generalship. Yet it must be saved, perhaps for future uses, and so the once imperial author says:

The German army was not defeated at the Marne; it was withdrawn by its leaders. The battle was lost because the Highest Command gave it up as lost; in spite of the numerical superiority of the enemy—in the ratio of two to one—that Highest Command might have led its armies to victory, if it had clearly perceived the situation and had acted adequately and resolutely.

It is not post factum wisdom, but the expression of a view borne in upon me at the time, when I say that, by a vigorous condensation of our right wing for united action and by strengthening it with easily possible reinforcements from the left wing, a dispersal of the threatening danger might have been achieved without any serious difficulty.

If the German army was not defeated at the Marne, it raises again the old question, Who won the war? Which is, perhaps, what such passages are intended to do.

The ex-Crown Prince takes himself seriously, and that makes his memoirs diverting. He supposes that he was quite a figure at Verdun, for example, and that it is necessary to defend himself from charges of butchering his people in those futile assaults. So he does it; but in strains more lyrical than logical, about "the laughing murderer of Verdun." It is not likely that history will hold him directly accountable for what happened there. His guilt was more political than military: his part in Germanism itself, exemplified in the incident of Zabern. If these remarks shall come to him and be found unpalatable, he has his revenge in advance in the stiff side-swipe with which he finally and contemptuously disposes of the Americans:

The American attacks were in themselves badly planned; they showed ignorance of warfare; the men advanced in columns and were mowed down by our remaining machine-guns. No great danger lay there. But their tanks pierced our thin lines—one man every twenty metres—and fired on us from behind. Not till then did the American infantry advance. Withal the Americans had at their disposal an incredible quantity of heavy and very heavy artillery. Their preliminary firing greatly exceeded in intensity and heaviness anything we had known at Verdun or on the Somme.

At last it is over, and father and son have fled to Holland. The prince finally executes a significant and decisive manœuvre—he crosses the border, analyzing his emotion at every inch:

Near Vroenhoven we halt in the Dutch barbed wire.

My heart thumps loudly as I jump out of the car. I am thoroughly conscious that the few paces before me are decisive. As though all crowded together in one moment, the pitiless and tormenting scenes of the last few days stand once again before me: Spa; the Kaiser; the field-marshal; Gröner's face; my Schulenberg, adjuring and undauntedly opposing the others; my father's letter; and the decision from Berlin which gives me my discharge and cuts the ground from under my feet.

No, it must be; it must be; there is no other way.

Suddenly there come into my mind the words that General von Falkenhayn used to call out to me when, as a boy, I had to take some difficult obstacle with my horse: "Fling your heart across first; the rest will follow."

Then I take a few steps in front of me.

That's German. And so is the special pleading. The waverings and vacillations of the sire are extensively recorded by the son; but the manner of departure from Spa has been sufficiently described elsewhere. This book will be found significant for its unconscious betrayal of the real spirit of the abdication and the renunciation:

All these facts seem to me to prove that His Majesty did not resolve, of his own accord, to go to Holland. On the contrary, he protested against the idea to the very last. But all his advisers, with the Higher Command at the head, employed the most forcible means to wrest this decision from him. The leading persons of his suite seem also to have gone over to the other side in the course of the afternoon and to have exerted themselves to obtain an early departure of His Majesty.

Shall I present to my German Fatherland the spectacle of one who persists in demanding his rights when they deny him the best elements in these rights—love and confidence? Shall I, by a rigid insistence upon "my bond," provide a war-cry for all those who stand for monarchy in the state, and that at a time when, according to my deepest convictions, the Fatherland—whether as republic or monarchy—demands from all of us internal solidarity against the rapacious desires of the "victors" around us and work, work, work?—Once more, No!

And if, under the stress of circumstances and for the benefit of the whole, the individual renounces a prescriptive right, does he thereby relinquish any part of that sublimer free right of obeying a possible summons issued to him by the will of the majority? My renunciation, proceeding from my love of the Fatherland, can not be regarded as blameworthy. It is evidence of one thing only, that in the fateful hours, with the enemy at our gates and divided counsels at home, when the great need of the moment was to save the country from further dissensions, I obeyed the demands which were calculated to serve her interests.

And so, I yielded to the somewhat belated wishes of the new government; but I repeat that it was not for their sakes and not because I recognized any of the traditional rights of my position as in any way affected by the violent doings of the revolution; no, it was because, so far as in me lies, I desire, as much as any one of my compatriots, honestly to help in preventing conflagration and in healing and strengthening by devotion and self-abnegation our so severely tried Fatherland, till the hour shall come in which I, too, may take active part with my fellows in productive labor in my home country.

The hour of fulfillment has, alas, not yet struck, and I can not yet actively cooperate in the work of restoration; all I can do is to await that hour in self-control and patience, enduring meanwhile the hardships of exile and solitude without complaint.

I do not summon to revenge or to arms or to violence. I call upon the spirit of Germany; let that be strengthened; for the mind makes the deed and the destiny—and senseless is the tool without the master. Possibly this saying is the key to that destiny through which we have been passing for a generation, and also to that which lies ahead and into which we may enter as victors over all our opponents if we do but bind together all the best of our energies into a potent whole.

As a demonstration of German psychology, and persistent royal receptivity, this book is well worth reading. There are passages of intense interest, such as the author's defense of his conduct after the incident of Zabern, and altogether it is one of the things that tend to throw a little more light on one of the darkest periods of our times.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending June 10, 1922, were $139,300,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $114,000,000; an increase of $25,300,000.

Average prices for a group of representative bonds of all classes show a gain of more than twelve points within less than a year. The advance has been entirely justified, but a level has been reached where many bonds are yielding as low a return as current money rates warrant, all things considered, and should the business revival reach the intensity anticipated, the demand for commercial credit may become strong enough to divert funds from the investment market in such quantities as to cause a reaction in those bonds which sell on a yield basis close to prevailing money rates, says Forbes Magazine.

Bank clearings outside of New York are showing a consistent expansion, April gaining about 11 per cent. over March, indicating the commercial demand is already increasing. It is this greater demand which explains in a way the present halt to the advance in prices for certain bonds, despite a decline in the volume of new bond offerings. Seasonal demands usually result in high money rates in the autumn, and this, coupled with the needs of a reviving industry, may cause a strain later on.

The situation suggests that discrimination has become necessary in the case of those who desire to invest with a view of combining a possible appreciation of principal with a satisfactory return. Convertible bonds seem to offer the best opportunity at this time. If the expected prosperity materializes, earnings for a number of companies will no doubt be sufficient to justify initial or increased dividends and to make profitable the conversion of their bonds into stock. In this connection the following bonds should be considered:

New York Central conv. deb. 6s, 1935 at 103. Conv. into New York Central stock at 105 any time prior to May 1, 1925. New York Central is earning about 12½ per cent. on its stock at this time, and, with the increased traffic which will probably come under better business conditions, should be able to pay a 7 per cent. dividend. On a 6 per cent. yield basis the stock would sell at 116, and the bonds be worth 110. But New York Central in a strong rail market may sell on a considerable lower yield basis than 6 per cent.

Chile Copper col. tr. conv. 6s, 1932 at 92. Convertible into stock at $135 a share at any time. Chile Copper has emerged from the development stage and is working into a position where large earnings are possible even under present prices for the metal. With higher prices for the metal, this company should pay a dividend which would justify more than $35 a share for the stock and correspondingly higher prices for these bonds.

Brooklyn Union Gas 7s, 1929, at 110. Convertible at part into stock at any time. The United States Supreme Court decision in the Consolidated Gas case holding the 80-cent gas rate confiscatory is a very favorable development and releases about $8,500,000 of impounded bonds. An 8 per cent. dividend rate is quite possible, which, on a 6 per cent. yield basis, would mean 132 for the stock and bonds.

Reference has been made in these columns in the past to the advantage of buying bonds that are not callable or are not likely to be called before maturity, says John H. Barnes in Century Magazine. It seems well to direct investors' attention to this point again, for on a recent day the morning papers carried the announcements of five new corporation bond issues all of which could be called for retirement at prices from one to twelve points above the offering prices. If interest rates continue to go down it will not be long before some of these issues can be retired and lower interest bonds sold in their place. And when it will be to the advantage of the companies to do this it will be to the disadvantage of the bondholders to have to reinvest their money at that time. Those who are buying high interest rate bonds at present should make sure that they are going to get that rate as long as they want it. If a bond is callable they may not do so.

And this point should not only be taken into consideration by those who buy solely for the income return they get on their money, but also by those who have a view to speculative profits on their investments as well. For if it is advantageous for a company to sell new bonds to retire a higher rate issue, even at 105 or 110, then those higher rate bonds, if they were not callable, would be selling still higher in the market. In a period of declining interest rates and advancing bond prices, like the present, callable features are likely to prove disadvantageous to bond buyers. Where their exercise is optional with the company, as is usually the case, they are never disadvantageous to the issuing company.

Investment bankers who underwrite new issues and distribute them to the public serve both the corporations and the investor. They advise with corporations as to the best forms of security to issue, and if they are investment bankers of good reputation and high standing they make sure that the issues are safe before they offer them to their clients. But in this matter of providing for the possibilities of the future they are more apt to give consideration to the viewpoint of the corporation than that of the investor, as is indicated by the number of bond issues now being brought out that are callable a few points above the issue price. If they are called and new bonds sold to replace them, the banker makes another underwriting commission. So he has a selfish interest in the matter.

The individual in this as well as in many other particulars involving the investment of his money, must, therefore, look out for his own interests. He should in the first place have complete information regarding each issue he thinks of buying. The monthly offering lists of most investment houses do not contain information as to callable features of the various issues, but this information together with information as to the assets and earnings back of the bonds can be secured by asking for detail circulars. These circulars should be studied as carefully as one would study a business proposition in which he is going to embark.

Some readers may wonder why so much attention is paid to this point of the callability of the bonds. It is true that other matters, such as the safety of the issue itself, is of more importance; but if the reader has been following these monthly articles he knows there are tides in the bond market just as in the affairs of men which taken at the flood may lead to fortune. In August, 1920, when the bond market was at the lowest point in a generation it was pointed out here that while a dollar would buy only 45 cents worth of food or clothing as compared with 1913 it would buy $1.37 worth of high-grade bonds as compared with their pre-war prices. It was then said: "When United States government bonds are selling to yield more than 5½ per cent. and the Pennsylvania Railroad and the New York Central are selling 7 per cent. securities, no regrets are likely to be felt by the investor who makes sure of securing for himself for a long period of years the high return that long-term bonds now give."

Again in February last year, referring to the tides of the bond market, it was written: "Twice since the beginning of this century has the tide flowed out, once it came back part way—in 1909—and recently it started in again, but has somewhat receded. Today bond prices are not much above the low-water mark for the past generation. . . . Therefore the present seems the time to dispose of short-term securities and buy long term. Near the crest of the flood-tide the thing to do will be to convert from the long-term investments into short so that there will be little or no depreciation of principal as the tide flows out."

Since then Liberty Loan bonds have advanced in price from a 5½ per cent. yield basis to a 4¼ per cent. basis, and longer-term corporation bonds have shown even greater improvement in price. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé general mortgage 4s, due 1995, which were down to 70¾ in 1920, are now at 89. New York Central refunding 3½s, due 1997, were down to 62½ and are now at 77½, and so on through the list of high-grade bonds.

Yet it does not seem that the flood-tide in bond prices has reached its height. A soldiers' bonus, with renewed inflation and some increase in the cost of living, may check its upward flow. But sight must not be lost of the pre-war level of 98 for Atchison general 4s and 87 for New York Central 3½s or of the high-water mark for such bonds around the beginning of the present century, when New York Central 3½s sold for 111. Some of the high interest rate bonds of the last two years have already been redeemed. There are many others now selling at, or near their redemption prices and they may be called soon. They will certainly not go much higher in price, no matter what other bonds may do. There is therefore every reason why the investor should avoid bonds that are callable, say, within ten points of their selling price; and there still seems good reason to believe that long-term bonds that enjoy a ready market are the best for those investors to buy who wish to profit by the upper flow of the tide in the bond market.

Leslie's Weekly recently had an article on "Civil vs. Swivel Service." The article goes on to show that the present civil service law is unsatisfactory.

It was intended to establish the merit system, but has succeeded in establishing a system which fastens upon the taxpayers' back thousands of incompetent employees who hold their jobs for life and do less and less work as time passes.

What private business could run with such an overhead?

"It is not a theoretical question," says Leslie's, "as to whether the average government employee gives as satisfactory service as he would be forced to do in the business world. A careful comparison by an expert accountant demonstrates that our government employees are 40 per cent. less efficient than are the employees of the United States Steel Corporation. The average Federal employee does just enough to get by."

As a result Washington is jammed with thousands of persons drawing the taxpayers' money and rendering as little service as possible. It is costing the head of the average American family $482.90 per annum to run the government, which it is claimed would be cut in half if government affairs were run on business lines.

This is the situation which the average American citizen faces. This is his government. Is he going to let it go from bad to worse until the overhead cost and the growing official classes virtually absorb his earnings and his home to cover their payroll?

It is time to wake up. No man could escape bankruptcy if his private business were run as government business is managed.

When the people demand efficiency in government and when a disinterested group of business men have something to say about the number of people employed in government departments, their hours of labor, the character of work they should do, and the pay they shall receive—then we will begin to get efficiency in government. But as long as the tax-eaters make up the expense estimates, establish their own wages and working conditions, and merely allow the taxpayers to subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company, was organized in 1870. It owns modern refineries at Philadelphia, Franklin, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and Brunswick, Georgia, an extensive system of sales stations, warehouses, storage plants throughout Pennsylvania and Delaware, gasoline and motor oil stations in the New England states, 75,000 tons dead-weight of tank steamers, marine equipment, etc. Through subsidiaries, it is interested in crude production in this country and Mexico.

Joint stock land banks, semi-Federal institutions, are now being rapidly organized in all parts of the country.

The attraction lies in the fact that the bonds issued by the banks to get the money to loan to farmers are free of all Federal, state, and local taxation.

Such bonds are in great demand by large income taxpayers and sell well.

Of course by as much as these bonds are exempt from taxation by so much are the taxes on other people's property increased.

As there are now some $30,000,000,000 in tax-exempt or partially tax-exempt bonds outstanding in the United States, it is easy to see why taxes of the ordinary citizen are mounting so rapidly.

A man with $100,000 to invest today puts it into tax-exempt bonds, pays no taxes, has no worries, and employs no labor.

No wonder there is growing demand for a change in this system so that all will pay taxes alike.—The Manufacturer.

That a spirit of decided optimism prevails in business circles in the East, and that the general feeling is one of abounding confidence in the immediate future, is the opinion expressed by John Britton, vice-president and general manager of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company, as a result of his observations during a recent trip to the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. Britton was given good opportunity to study conditions, for in his travels he took in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Cleveland, and Chicago, and in all of these he came in contact with leaders, not only of the electric industry, but of many others through which the commercial pulse of the nation is felt. "I found throughout the East a decided feeling of optimism concerning the future," states Mr. Britton.

"This I found to be particularly noticeable in our own business. There is a general extension of the uses to which electricity is being put. In all the cities I noticed the demand is constantly increasing for residential, commercial, and industrial purposes. The steel mills in Chicago, Cleveland, and Pittsburgh are beginning to be very active. Money is plentiful, apparently, and for the public utilities especially, showing that industries like that with which I am particularly concerned are now regarded with favor."

President Harding's newspaper, the Marion, Ohio, Daily Star, has the following to say editorially about municipal or public ownership of public utilities:

"The municipal shops of Chicago, built and equipped by the city at a cost of $2,700,000, have ceased to operate as municipal institutions. Under municipal ownership, repairs and supplies cost three times what the same work with the same materials would have cost if let out to privately-managed concerns. It's the same old story of inefficiency which invariably follows municipal, state, or Federal ownership. And yet there are people right here in Marion who still advocate municipal ownership of public utilities."

Blyth, Witter & Co. are offering a new issue of Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company cumulative 6 per cent. preferred stock, exempt from personal property taxes in California and wholly exempt from normal Federal income tax.

The present value of the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company's physical property is largely in excess of the cost of that property as carried on the books. On February 28, 1922, the book cost of the company's assets, valuing securities of subsidiary companies at conservative figures, amounted to over $147,000,000. Adding net quick assets and deducting the total bonded indebtedness of the company, after giving effect to the sale of this stock, the book value applicable to $37,000,000 of preferred stock, including this issue, is over $96,000,000.

The thirty-eighth annual report of the Southern Pacific Company to its 53,466 stockholders, as given by J. Kruttschnitt, chairman of the executive committee, and made public by William Sproule, president, shows that despite adverse conditions during the calendar year 1921 operating expenses were reduced 12.20 per cent. and net revenue from railway operations increased 41.75 per cent.

"This net result," the report said, "reflects the improvement forecast in last year's report as progress is made in substituting the incentive of self-interest of private management, and the increased efficiency and more sheerful service of the entire operating staff, for the apathy and blight of government management."

"Operating revenues were seriously affected by nation-wide business depression and were aggravated on your company's lines by diversion of transcontinental business, by much lower rates offered by the Panama Canal route, and by the competition on the highways of motor trucks substantially free from taxation and regulation.

"The traffic units handled show a decrease of 20.71 per cent. from the peak of 1920, and although increased freight and passenger rates, made effective August, 1920, were enjoyed during the entire year, operating revenues decreased 4.53 per cent. Average wages paid throughout 1921 were slightly higher than in 1920, as the wage increase dating from May, 1920, was effective during eight months of that year and six months of 1921, while during the remaining six months of 1921 wages were higher than during the first four months of 1920. Prices of fuel and other material in 1921 also averaged more than in 1920."

Reviewing the railroads' applications for readjustment of wages and modification of national agreements, whereby unearned wages and excessive amounts of overtime were paid, the report notes that these applications have been granted only in part.

The $12,775,138.92 decrease in operating revenues is largely attributed to business depression, dearth of large conventions such as were held on the Pacific Coast in 1920, and unregulated form of competition. Small cotton crops in Texas and Louisiana and reduction of rates on such important commodities as beans, canned goods, live stock, lumber, apples, canteloupes and vegetables also contributed to this result.

"Steamship lines operating through the Panama Canal enjoy conspicuous advantages, because their rates, which are not subject to regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, may be freely changed from day to day. If these vessels are exempted from the payment of tolls, as pending legislation contemplates, their advantage will be increased at the expense of the taxpayers of the entire country.

"To make rates to or from Pacific Coast ports to secure a share of the traffic fostered by the railroads, for which the Canal steamship lines now compete, the railroads are required by the long and short haul provision of the interstate commerce law to reduce rates to the same basis as maxima at all intermediate points (where they are not necessary to meet the water competition), unless relief from that requirement is granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and even if such relief should be eventually granted, the railroads are subjected to the loss of the coast traffic during the many months consumed in hearings, argument, consideration, and decision. Applications made in June and August, 1921, have not yet been decided, after nearly a year's delay."

Many years ago Federal government agents invoked the Sherman anti-trust law to break up the network of connecting railroad lines that—some christened Southern Pacific, others Central Pacific—together form a unified system of transportation. They are now surprised at the reception given their completed work, says the Review, issued by Strassburger & Co. Look at the map. The effect, if the plan were carried out in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court, would be, as a contemporary puts it, "that California would be isolated from Oregon; that all Eastern traffic over the Central Pacific must go via Niles Cañon and Stockton; that the principal Sacramento and San Joaquin Valley towns will connect with San Francisco only through Stockton and Niles; that Lathrop, Modesto, Merced, and other valley towns will be off the Southern Pacific line from San Francisco to Los Angeles; that some Sierra foothill towns will be isolated; that the East Bay towns south of Oakland will be cut off from Southern Pacific connections, etc."

Fortunately, the Interstate Commission, under the Transportation Act, wields a power superior in these matters even to that of the Supreme Court. The Transportation Act of 1920 expressly states that "they are hereby relieved from the operations of the anti-trust laws and all other restraints or inhibitions by laws, state or Federal, in so far as may be necessary to enable them to do anything authorized or required by any order." The united efforts of this commission, and the railroad commission—which knows local conditions and its duty to California interests—may be trusted to deal with this menace. For governmental ignorance is a menace, of all menaces the most serious we have to contend with in this state.

The recently issued annual report of the New York Central, for the year 1921, tends to confirm the belief of those who are of the opinion that an increase of the dividend rate would be warranted at any time. Last year New York Central earned $8.91 per share on its stock, but by far the greater part of the net earnings were made in the latter half of the year. The first four months of 1922 show such large increases over the corresponding period of last year as to warrant the belief that the showing made this year will be substantially better than in 1921. Incidentally, it should be noted that New York Central staged its remarkable recovery of last year in the face of a decrease in gross revenues of $46,493,461. All in all, the new railroad properties which have made a more

The record than that of New York Central during the last few years. Always efficiently operated, with a roadbed having few sharp grades and traversing the most thickly settled portions of the United States, New York Central normally requires somewhat less proportionate expenditure on maintenance than other railroads. Yet in spite of the great decline in operating revenues, maintenance work in recent years has been kept substantially above the normal pre-war ratio to gross revenues.—McDonnell & Co.

Judge Robert S. Lovett, chairman of the board of directors of the Union Pacific system, in discussing present-day conditions and the menace to business and prosperity from excessive taxation, says:

"The greatest damper upon business revival and the greatest menace to the return of prosperity in this country is taxation. I am sure people generally do not realize the seriousness of this aspect of the situation. Business is carried on for profit; men undertake new enterprises, employ labor, and take the risks for profit; it is largely the surplus wealth invested in enterprises carried on by others that affords most employment for labor outside of agriculture.

"The country ought to take its bearings before some of its vital interests go on the rocks. How unfortunate is the delusion that we can make the rich pay all the taxes! I agree that taxes should be paid in proportion to the ability of the taxpayers, but we have added to that principle a progressive ratio that is economically ruinous, and the danger is that we as a people will become very poor and economically weak and emaciated before we correctly diagnose our case and find out what is the matter with us. It is hard for those of us who haven't much to believe that we can suffer from the gouging of a rich man by the government. We ought to ponder Bismarck's statement that 'socialism can make rich men poor, but it can never make a poor man rich.'—Industrial News Bureau.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

The French Academy voted June 14th a fête in honor of Camille Flammarion. The great French astronomer, who passed his eightieth birthday in February, has spent sixty years in the devoted interests of science and is fully as entitled to a fête day as a man can be. The remarkable thing is that M. Flammarion has practically devoted his life to astronomy, the most lofty of all the sciences—the punning is not intentional—and that he is most popularly known for his dabbling in the most dubious of scientific realms, the occult. True, the most skeptical of us are gradually beginning to realize that there is "something there." But what of it? Before the war no one who wished to be accepted as of normal intelligence dared expose a curiosity concerning the supernatural. All information of that ilk was considered old wives' tales. Yet today—and it is one of the most conspicuous changes wrought by the war—the best publishers issue psychic stuff in quantities, and what is more these books are best sellers among the non-fiction class. M. Flammarion's "At the Moment of Death" (Century) will doubtless be popular. Its predecessor was, in a less psychically attuned atmosphere; and the wave of candid interest in the uncanny has been steadily swelling ever since. Briefly, "At the Moment of Death" is a collection of well-authenticated histories of death apparitions, death warnings, and death messages. Needless to say, it is presented with the utmost scientific precision, and so far as a book of this sort can be valuable, it is. But one wonders, after all, if the hysteric interest being shown in psychic phenomena can be a wholesome one. When all is said and done we must endure our humdrum span here, and it seems to me it would be more dignified to do it with less servility to the future.

It seems impossible to dodge the occult; the virus has even attacked fiction. Mrs. Belloc Lowndes' new book, "What Timmy Did" (Doran) is a case in point. That distinctly fascinating story, however, reminds one of the old saw that there is nothing new under the sun, for it is a sort of amalgam of Henry James' two stories, "The Turn of the Screw" and "What Maisie Knew." Not that we accuse Mrs. Belloc Lowndes of plagiarism—even the striking coincidence with the latter title and that of her book is the sort of literary coincidence that will happen. The fact remains that James has set the form for the psychic novel of childhood in "The Turn of the Screw" and for the precocious child story in "What Maisie Knew." It will take an original writer indeed to make a new mold, though there is, of course, Walpole's "The Golden Scarecrow." But that is an entirely different sort of thing, more angelic than ghoulish.

"What Timmy Did" is a rattling good story, refreshing in its difference, at least, from the ordinary novel and as full of mystery, suspense, and murder clues as an Arsene Lupin yarn. Mrs. Lowndes has in fact discovered a new field to work in—one quite remote from her old pastures. Yet half the charm of the book is in her familiar style of rendering English country life intimately. The present book has the added merit of being a lifelike picture of post-war English economy. It shows that the old fascination of pictures of "genteel" life did not depend on the vicarious impression of affluence. If the author has a fault in the art of painting graceful and familiar domesticity it is that of too much detail. She does not give her reader's imagination enough credit nor enough rein. We suspect that she has been writing for the movies and it has intensified her native disposition to supply minutiae. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

One of the choice association books included in the recent sale of the library of the late Edward Hornor Coates of Philadelphia was a copy of "Stalky and Co." On the fly leaf Kipling had written: "Many thanks for your note. It's good hearing that 'Stalky and Co.' amused you, because I had rather a good time myself writing it. It's in the nature of a moral tract—only a perverse generation insists on calling it comic, and a boy's book, and a lot of other things which it isn't. It's all cribbed from Froebel with a few alterations to disperse the plagiarisms."

A best-seller that is also a high-brow publication is the issue of John Drinkwater's plays and poems, which has sold 25,000 copies in England in less than a year.

It is commonly said nowadays that "every one writes." The statistics for Great Britain, at least, lend color to the theory. The editor of the Literary Year Book says that between 25,000 and 26,000 persons in the British Isles are writing either wholly or partly for a living.

Miss E. M. Delafield, who in private life is Mrs. Paul Dashwood, never was, as a matter of fact, Miss Delafield in life. She is the daughter of Mrs. Henry de la Pasture, now Lady Clifford, herself a distinguished novelist, and "Miss Delafield" chose that nom de plume in order not to trespass on her mother's literary preserves.

Blasco Ibañez' novel, "The Shadow of the Cathedral," has been turned into the libretto of an opera by two French authors, Lena and Henry Ferrare, and set to music by Georges Hué. A Parisian critic, Pierre Lalo, writing in Le Temps recently after its initial performance, spoke highly of both libretto and music, saying of the latter that it is "a composition of very serious value."

The Living Age has taken the trouble to exhume Swiss literature and to investigate its present status quo. The outstanding fact is a dearth of native drama. Schiller's "Wilhelm Tell," which the Swiss themselves regard as the national drama, is the work of a dramatist who was never in Switzerland. "Marignano," the most noteworthy modern play dealing with Swiss history, is by a German professor of strong Chauvinist policies. The Living Age opines that the Swiss lack of drama may be due to Switzerland's lack of theatres. However, the little country does boast two first-class writers, Max Pulver, the interpreter of the classic and mediæval world, and Albert Steffen, who is best known as a novelist. Pulver has been called one of the most promising writers in German literature.

There has just been published in Paris an edition of the works of Cyrano de Bergerac, the seventeenth-century prototype of Rostand's most popular hero. The publication has been made the occasion for some research concerning M. Rostand's fidelity to history. The Living Age records the fact that the historic Cyrano was no Gascon gentleman, but a Parisian bourgeois. "He was born in 1619, the fourth son of Abel de Cyrano. He added the 'de Bergerac' himself, taking the name from a small estate that his father had once owned and later sold." Both Cyrano, it appears, were military men of great bravery, were well educated, poets and students of philosophy. The original's master was Gassendi, the Epicurean, who numbered Molière among his pupils. Cyrano died still a young man in 1655 as the result—even as in the play—of a piece of timber having been dropped on his head—it has never been quite certain whether by accident or design. M. Lachèvre's edition of Cyrano's works, while it is not complete, is said to be the most authoritative yet issued.

The Longmans, the oldest English publishing house, has opened a Canadian branch in Toronto. The Macmillans have had a house there for some time and the Oxford University Press has a branch in Toronto. For the benefit of the curious, who may wonder why Toronto is so favored instead of Montreal, the real commercial centre of Canada, the explanation is given that Montreal is half French, and the French-Canadians are not great buyers of English books. Toronto, on the other hand, is a particularly English town.

The mania for publicity is not yet universal. The King of the Belgians has kept a war journal, but so far has refused to publish it.

A. S. M. Hutchinson's sister, Miss Vere Hutchinson, has written a novel, "Sea Wrack," that is said to be "the sort of book that Stevenson would have welcomed with a shout."

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

A Pair of Idols.

There are two kinds of realism. If one is going to portray a large section of society after the manner of Balzac one must needs be rather gloomy. Common sense and experience disdain a representation of life en masse if it is not pessimistic. But there is one way of dodging the issue. To write a story that is at once sunny and realistic, one need only turn to the sunny time of life, extreme youth, as Mr. Tarkington knows, and "Moon Calf" to the contrary.

However, Stewart Caven had probably no such formula in mind in writing "A Pair of Idols." That book is far too delightful to be the result of a recipe—to be anything but spontaneous. "A Pair of Idols" is an Irish idyll; it is broad but delicate comedy; it is a realistic picture of modern Ireland; and it is one of the most refreshing novels that have recently come from the press. At a time when opening a new novel is tantamount to submerging oneself in a contemplation of the hopelessness of life and the general decay of society, it is a unique experience to read "A Pair of Idols."

Jessica's Book.

Among most minor poets there is not much to choose. Friends and patrons may know their work apart, but it is mostly "minor" poetry to the unprejudiced critic. However, a slim book very modestly subtitled "a volume of verse," by William Van Wyck, seems to violate this generalization. Minor poetry it surely is, for it has no particularly new message. "Jessica's Book" consists of fifty-nine pages of lyrics and sonnets and ballades of the approved graceful fashion. But Mr. Van Wyck is possessed of a delicate satire, rare we think in minor poets, which relieves his verse of all monotony and marks it aside in one's memory. His sonnets are thoughtful, his songs musical, and his ballades racy.

America Faces the Future.

A book written for college students and other young Americans with whom the politics of the near future lie, is "America Faces the Future," by Durant Drake. This is an admirable treatise of the principles which should animate American politics and which in an earlier era were at least recognized as ideal. The object is not to retard progress, but to recall the progressive principles which, in practice at least, have ceased to dominate American politics. Mr. Drake is a liberal and a progressive and his five essays, theoretical though they sound, on Labor, Equality, Democracy, Efficiency, and Patriotism, are written from the liberal and practical viewpoint.

AMERICA FACES THE FUTURE. By Durant Drake. New York: The Macmillan Company; $2.50.

Dickens in Camp.

Fifty years have passed since Bret Harte's collected works were published, and this reprint of what is generally considered his finest poem is a fitting commemoration of the half-century anniversary. Mr. Howell has issued the familiar poem beautifully with a foreword by Frederick S. Myrtle, recording its not so familiar history. Harte had been a lifelong admirer of Dickens since he had first encountered "Dombey & Son" at the age of six. The Californian had been to a remarkable extent molded by the English novelist's style and tastes. What is not so generally known is that Dickens entertained a sincere admiration for the younger writer. "His biographer, John Forster, relates that Dickens called his attention to two sketches by Bret Harte, 'The Luck of Roaring Camp' and 'The Outcasts of Poker Flat,' in which, writes the biographer, 'he had found such subtle strokes of character as he had not elsewhere in later years discovered; the manner resembling himself, but the matter fresh to a degree that amazed him; the painting in all respects masterly and the wild rude thing painted a quite wonderful reality. I have rarely known him more honestly moved.'"

"Dickens in Camp" was written on the occasion of the great novelist's death. When Harte heard the news he ordered the forthcoming publication of his Overland Monthly held back for twenty-four hours while he paid his tribute to "the master." The present edition is limited to 350 copies, and is admirably printed on American Japan paper, decorated by Joseph Sinel, and is bound in sage gray boards.

DICKENS IN CAMP. By Bret Harte. With an introduction by Frederick S. Myrtle. San Francisco: John Howell; $7.50.

The Poetic Mind.

Mr. Prescott attempts to explain the operation of the poet's mind. His treatment of this rather abstruse subject is comprehensive and conscientious, likewise cumbersome. The average reader, after perusing the book, will probably feel somewhat as the average churchman of the middle ages did after a lecture on the angel-carrying capacity of a pin-point, and will undoubtedly agree with the author's statement (made in all seriousness) that "inquiry will at best only push the mystery a little farther off."

THE POETIC MIND. By F. C. Prescott. New York: The Macmillan Company; $2.

Walking Happily.

From too much proximity the generations shrink in stature, says the Portland Oregonian. The rule that nature has for the garden and the field varies not at all in its application to folk. Plainly it is incumbent upon the urbanite to avail himself of every means that will contest this tendency. His environment is not the most favorable, though the city be spacious and cleanly. He should walk.

England was complacently content when the Boer war called her sons to the colors. They would suffice, those Englishmen, as their fathers before them. But the perfect British poise was rudely disturbed by an alarming, a significant, revelation. The recruits of that day were an inch and more shorter than their sires. Since Wellington's time something had happened to the average stature of those islanders. That something was congested living and banishment from field and sea, where the breezes are clean and vigorous and there is room for a fixed muscle and where the casual job flexes them. It was a cruel stab to English pride, the discovery, followed as it was by an enforced lowering of the minimum height requirements for military service.

Only a century or so mark a similar decrease in Japanese stature. Congestion in country, as in city, the relinquishment of the martial exercises that maintained physique, may not have affected the national spirit, but assuredly took toll of the average stature. The sons of Nippon today are not the men their grandsires were. The armor of the samurai would yield them room enough to turn around within the plates. And the reason for this, as the reason for the English decrease in stature, was that a race had seeded itself into sedentation. The law is inexorable. Any nation, by declining to take thought, can steal a cubit from its stature if given time enough.

We ride too much and walk too little. Come May and the blossoming dogwood, or November and the sting of sleet, the truth is that he who rides by habit misses much that would gladden him if he but walked. He misses the long stride that annihilates the distance with a sense of conquest, the deep breath that revamps the lungs, and the ever-changing picture of the wayside. No form of exercise quite replaces the natural physical expression of walking. Authorities agree that it is conducive to longevity, and lack not for instances in proof. Be that as it may, walking is conducive to immediate health and happiness; to that physical excellence which permits one to taste the savor of living.

Lord Grey and Lloyd George.

Lord Robert Cecil, in a recent speech at Hitchin, as reported by the Manchester Guardian, had this to say about the premiership:

"I have much respect for Mr. Asquith, and I have never shared in the unjust attacks that have been made upon him from some quarters. Why, then, do I speak of Lord Grey? Quite apart from any question of the respective merits of Lord Grey and Mr. Asquith, there are electors in this country who would be prepared to support a government with Lord Grey as prime minister and who would not be prepared to support a government with Mr. Asquith in that position. It is not only party feelings, it is no want of respect for Mr. Asquith, to say that. Lord Grey has, above all men I know of, the particular qualities the country needs at the present time. His great experience in foreign affairs, when for some time to come foreign affairs must be our chief occupation, is only one thing. It is not the greatest.

"It is difficult to say without impertinence wherein his special fitness seems to me to consist. Perhaps I may be allowed to put it like this: I do not know of any other man who differs so completely in both his qualities and in defects from the prime minister, and I am quite sure that the people of this country require in their statesmen that characteristic above all other at the present time. For what we need most of all is to restore confidence both at home and abroad. Confidence is the base of all peace and all prosperity. Can any one say that the present government inspires confidence? No one trusts them. That is really fatal; and if the country is to be saved we must have a change. I am profoundly convinced that if tomorrow it could be announced that Mr. Lloyd George had resigned and the king had sent for Lord Grey, a sigh of relief would go up from the whole civilized world."

The Duttons have just published a practical handbook for the man who wishes to learn to speak the Chinese language. It is "Colloquial Chinese" (Northern), by A. Neville J. Whyman, who is lecturer in Chinese and Japanese in the University of London. The author assures the student that while the written style of Chinese is probably the most difficult study in the world, yet the colloquial style is as easy to acquire as elementary Latin or French. Mr. Whyman has spent many years in teaching colloquial Chinese to white men and English to Chinamen, and in this little volume has crystallized his very valuable experience. Here he lays down the general principles of the spoken language, gives a sound table, and presents sufficient exercises in the construction of simple sentences to afford the student a solid ground-work. There is also a large and carefully selected vocabulary.

The king's minstrel of medieval times was the prototype of the modern poet laureate. The minstrel was usually chosen from one of the universities. In the time of Charles I the appointment was put on an official basis and the post of poet laureate created.

Japan's Pacific Policy

ESPECIALLY IN RELATION TO CHINA, THE FAR EAST, AND THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE

By K. K. Kawakami, Author of "What Japan Thinks," etc.

Mr. Kawakami has been well and favorably known for several years as an interpreter of Oriental nature and aspirations for the Orient. Here he goes further and interprets the reactions of both the East and the West. It is a keen and searching analysis of Japan's situation and political necessities in relation to the peculiar problems of the Pacific. It is a sane and valuable book from every point of view, and its appendix the author presents for reference practically all the Conference documents on Japan, China and the Pacific.

"THE MOUNTBANK OF EMOTIONS."

Ben Hecht, author of "Erik Dorn," is a novelist, not having yet graduated as a full-sized dramatist, although he has written a number of one-act plays. And the title of "The Mountbank of Emotions" is such a title as a novelist might choose: not possessing quite sufficient snap for a play. It gives a promise of character psychology, which, indeed, the play bears out. Felix Tarbell, the "mountbank," having an entirely novel method of enjoying feminine adulation, and the forth-putting of feminine lures. The author, in fact, has succeeded in presenting a suggested development in the first two acts, and a culmination, or climax, in the last, which is rather original.

Nevertheless, he works out his theme—the effect produced on those around him by the mountbank's dalliance with the Great Emotion—in a way that infers a lack of professional experience, for there is a slackness in what should be the taut thread of suspense.

We are, during the first two acts, kept in a state of rather baseless anticipation, for very little in the way of a dramatic situation results in the first act, and we are obliged to put up with an unduly extended scene to work our way toward the humorous climax in the second. Fortunately, in the third, although the auditor is by this time somewhat chastened in his anticipations, the dilletantism gives way to a real situation, and the spectator enjoys the long-deferred sensation of dramatic tension.

The general situation is this: Felix Tarbell, the mountbank, is an egotist. His business is to write plays, his habit to pose as a man of illicit gallantries, his tendency to study human nature in an entirely cold-blooded way, and his determination, due to a fastidiousness which stands between him and real living, is to escape scot-free from the numerous vexing demands, duties, experiences, pin-pricks, and aftermaths that dog the ordinary man. He is the envy of his fellow-dramatists, the despair of managers, the inspiration of romantic young women, the sought-after of interviewers, and the favorite topic of scandal-mongers.

Like the "great lover," Felix seldom lets a pretty woman get by; always provided she puts some lure and piquancy in the attack. So, in the first act we see that his wife coddles him, his feminine—and pretty—interviewer feels the beginning of a sentimental interest in him, and the leading lady in his new play is industriously engaged in trying to start an intrigue with him.

In the second act she has a nicely decorated net all ready for him: cushions, pastilles, clinging and liberally revealing draperies, a dim light, tea, sugared confections, kisses, and clinging arms.

But the cold-blooded fly becomes surfeited with the Oriental atmosphere, and escapes the sugared importunities of the pretty little spider by bored, ignominious, and humiliating flight.

In the third act Felix is pursued into the very innermost shrine of his domesticity by the pretty interviewer, who is also in search of sentimental excitements. And here, after she is gotten rid of, we suddenly run into the long-deferred scene, in which Felix learns that his pose has taken in his hitherto faithful and now rebellious wife, and the fair recalcitrant learns that this pose has ruined in him all capacity for honest or dishonest emotion; for he can't even take an intrigue seriously, and runs away from it.

As to the author's construction of the play; it is too leisurely, too long drawn out. He repeats effects in the two sentimental interviews, and deplorably allows Felix' two amorous nymphs to bore the audience as well as himself. The preliminaries in the first act are too scattered, too unculminating, and the author is a little baffling, at first, for the average spectator in his attempts to place Felix as an indolent artist who will not be bothered by dollar-chasers.

If Mr. Hecht, with his tendency toward leisuredness, had not given the lachrymose Sally Hoyd so much play with her handkerchief during the third act it would have improved it considerably. For, by one of those coincidences of which the world is full, Felix runs on a chance discovery that makes the rather languid spectators sit up and take notice, as they did in "La Tendresse" when Barnum found that there were holes in the apparently veracious account of how his pretty Marthe had spent her morning.

For Felix finds that Helen's recital of the engagement that carries her away from his sick bedside—or couchside—also has holes in it; and the thread of interest, or suspense, or whatsoever, becomes taut at last; for the very first time.

That is the very great defect of the play. It doesn't seize you and hold you, willy-nilly, until the last scene.

There are other faults, one of them being a vagueness in the early character indications expressed by Helen and Sally, although perhaps the author intended the lack of congruity, so as to give us a later shock of surprise.

The dialogue is a very good point in the piece, for although the author occasionally falls back on platitudes he has plenty of neatly turned, mildly cynical phrases for the "phrase-maker," as he labels Felix, which amused the audience.

Compared to the effective theatricalities of "Toto" and "The Great Lover," with their bustle of action, "The Mountbank of Emotions" is at a disadvantage, for while they are shallow and banal in their theatricality Mr. Hecht's play lacks punch in all but the final scene; although it should be added that the frequent laughter of the audience was a testimony in favor of the wit and humor of the dialogue.

Personally, I really enjoyed "The Mountbank of Emotions" more than the other two, because, with all its faults of inexperience—the other two being written by experienced craftsmen on the job—it showed initiative, a departure from stereotype, and a recognition of the queer incalculabilities of human nature. And there is a certain sincerity in it, too; for just as Floyd Dell was mentally autobiographical in "The Moon Calf," so, I venture to surmise, was Ben Hecht in "The Mountbank of Emotions." For the young author—I do not doubt he is young—has probably, in his search for material by following up adventure on the highways and byways of life, found himself exhausting his capacity for emotional reaction; and forthwith transplanted his discovery to a play; the more advanced young authors of the day being nothing if not self-revealing.

That the play earned its right to a second week was probably due to the humor of the lines, so skillfully conveyed by Leo Ditrichstein, and to the "punch" in the final scene of the final act; for one punch has been known to make a play.

There is no genuine characterization or sincere drama in either "Toto" or "The Great Lover," and therefore the company appeared to greater advantage in "The Mountbank of Emotions." And Mr. Ditrichstein, in spite of the magnetic charm of the urbane lover of all charming women in both of the earlier plays, was not called on for very much more trying work than being an embodied manner. Whereas in the Ben Hecht play he had to express a character of some subtlety, give numerous delicate touches of comedy, use art and intelligence in the delivery of Ben Hecht's epigrams, and finally figure with some dignity—neither Toto nor Jean Paurel possessed any dignity of character whatsoever—in a scene that was quite fully permeated with the elements of drama.

All these things this master of elegant comedy did admirably, and with the finish inseparable from his stage work; which seems to be tending steadily toward elegant artificiality.

Miss Frances Underwood had rather a plump and juicy rôle as Norma Ramon, the leading lady whose erotic and somewhat battered affections are tending toward a romantically sub rosa affair with the gallant and fascinating Felix. Miss Underwood has something of the fault of over-sacchariness in voice and manner. But it fell in admirably with the rôle of the young actress who was so fascinated with her profession that she kept on acting even in the scene with her admirer, with whom she had persuaded herself that she was in love.

Miss Florence Short came out as quite a beauty in the rôle of the black-haired wife, and did her part well in the final scene of revelation, but Clara Mackin has not mastered the art of weeping woefully.

Catherine Carter, the partisan friend of the wife, was a very ornate object in the scenes in which she figured, and so always is Miss Mary Duncan. But why did the young lady laugh so long and determinedly at nothing? It couldn't be as an intimation that she was a movie actress, as movie experience doesn't overtax the risible organs as unsparingly as Miss Duncan was overtaxing hers. Half a dozen other players were necessary to represent the rather long cast, their work showing careful rehearsal. I thought that the guilty wife's gallant, as played by Mr. Orlando Daly, was suitably acted, but wondered if they meant an actor of the Mephistophelian type of feature to represent a stage villain instead of what should have been merely a good-looking man of the world alert in stalking the quarry: a pretty woman who was willing.

I shouldn't wonder if Mr. Ditrichstein could make the play go for awhile in the East. Take three particularly charming women for the rôles of Sally, Helen, and Norma—for, though there is quite a collection of beauties in the company none of them has actual finesse, charm, or fascination—and brighten up the sentimental interviews with Sally and Norma by a few more bubbles of wit, and not only the lure, but the humor, of the situations would be considerably enhanced.

STAGE FADDERY.

Those brilliant theorizers who settle down to giving out inspired ideas concerning the modern stage certainly do occasionally come to the relief of suffering humanity. The Craig theories, for instance, which condemned redundancy of stage appointment, thus doing away with the expensive and unnecessary elaboration of stage sets so carefully developed by David Belasco, have been a boon to the stage; and in time will be to the old-school managers who have not yet assimilated them.

But theorizers are apt to go too far, even when they are as brilliant as Ellen Terry's son. Mr. Craig carried intelligent readers with him in his ideas, until he let himself go with a bang and struck the snag of wild unreason.

Apparently this radical has suffered from the projection of uncongenial personalities and unsympathetic voices across the footlights. For only thus can we account for Mr. Craig's thirst to silence players with eternal pantomime, or else supplant them by marionettes.

What? Deprive us of the charm of the human voice, of its expressive music, of its conveyance of individuality? And are we to be robbed of the delight of rendering homage to a fascinating personality?

Mr. Craig has helped the modern stage, but the extreme theories advanced in the later chapters of his book discredited him with many admirers who would otherwise grant him due honor.

Yvette Guilbert, also, is deeply interested in the advancement of stage art—which she finds most deplorable in America—and has many interesting things to say about it.

But here, suddenly, she also collides with the reef of unreason. She states it as her conviction that the theatre of today must be destroyed in order to supplant a dead art by a living one. As to that I pass. We don't know much any more about theatrical art out here on the edge of the Pacific, and perhaps she is right.

But, in stating her conviction that the bodies of plays of today are insufficiently trained to express so plastic an art, Mme. Guilbert advances the idea that the stage of the future should be the centre of the audience. For only thus, she believes, will players, viewed from all sides in a brilliant light, fully train the body to express and supplement the emotions indicated in the face.

Now let us throw a little common sense on the question. The idea is wild and impracticable for the simple reason that the player must have some sort of suggestive background.

Imagine, for instance, seeing Hampden enacting the rôle of Macbeth against a massed background of human shapes, among whom we may recognize Totty Jones in the act of wiping her nose, or Cholly Brown's dad taking a nap.

Would you then, unkind lady, rob us of our illusion? For we wish to get far, far away from Totty and Cholly, and when you promulgate a theory that would permit them to compete with the stage protagonist for our wavering attention, then we can but surmise that you are merely talking through your hat.

MR. PIM'S CREATOR.

Over in England they seem to regard A. A. Milne as the coming dramatist. Or rather as the one who has arrived. For "Belinda"—played here some months ago by the Maitland company—with its sprightly wit and pleasant light comedy atmosphere paved the way, and "Mr. Pim Passes By," which we are to see at the Columbia Theatre June 19th, made the big, big hit. "The Dover Road" reveals an appreciation for old English comedy, and "The Truth About Blayds" indicates that the author, although young enough to belong to the present, has a great respect for the literature of the Victorian era.

Mr. Milne's hold on the public is due partly to the originality of his ideas, partly to the genuineness of his humor, and partly because, like Barrie, he possesses an individuality in the charm which his plays exercise. So far he has not entered that realm of gay and delicate fantasy in which Barrie rules, but his dwelling place is not far from its boundaries.

His plays are not faultless, for, in order to make the dénouement effective and decisive, he departs from sober probability. But even in such apparently frivolous comedies as "The Great Broxopp" he has cleverly tucked a fundamental but not too insistent proverbial truth.

"The Truth About Blayds" is so far Mr. Milne's most notable contribution to the drama. It is a story of a nonagenarian poet's lifelong imposition, as the result of which a serious situation results, in respect to rights of inherited property. And here Mr. Milne's fault of solving the winding-up problems preceding the final curtain without due regard to the probabilities comes in play. One sees a similarity to the final solution in Granville Barker's "The Voysey Inheritance," only Barker's is worked out on strictly logical grounds.

Mr. Milne, like Barrie—and also, by the way, like the author of "If Winter Comes"—is rather shy, reserved, and secluded in his character. Still, he is an outdoor man; a true Briton in his taste for cricket and golf. His war experiences did not check the flow of his humor, which continued during his absence from England to effervesce in the shape of verses and skits, and which is so delightful a characteristic of his plays. Perhaps the estimation in which Milne is held in England may be deduced from the following extract from a review in the London Times: "Comic he is, both in the vulgar and the strict sense: he provokes hearty laughter, and also calls up the serious emotions which are not too serious to be within the province of comedy. Further . . . he is a man of letters. He has impeccable taste, unobtrusive culture, and a delicious style." JOSEPHINE HART KPELPS.

Venus Rather Than Mars.

The planet Mars—an old dying world—is receiving altogether too much attention from earthly scientists these days and nights, says a correspondent of the New York Times, while the up-and-coming young planet Venus is just waiting for a chance to know us better. This is the conclusion of Professor Svante Arrhenius, Nobel Prize winner and one of Europe's foremost scientists and astronomers, who has recently been lecturing in Stockholm on the prospect of wheedling from the heavens the secrets of some of our celestial neighbors, and especially Mars, when that planet swings into closest proximity to the earth two years hence.

If scientists and long-distance radio enthusiasts really wanted to communicate with some celestial neighbor, Professor Arrhenius said, they would not find Mars very cordial, for the old fellow is covered with hard frozen sand and is so dry that its only rain is meteoric dust. Perhaps a few sea weeds still existed, he said, but it was highly improbable that even low animal life could find enough to sustain it. He described as "fantastic" the belief that so-called canals observed on the planet were the work of engineers and attributed them to earthquake fissures.

Venus, on the other hand, offered possibilities to the patient astronomer, Professor Arrhenius declared. By "patient" he meant about a billion years, he explained. At the expiration of this period, he thought a flourishing colony of intelligent beings might be discovered on the bright little planet.

"Everything on Venus is dripping wet," he continued. "The planet is covered by constant rain clouds ten kilometers thick, preventing any rays from the sun penetrating to the bottom of the air strata. Life on the planet of love is short and intense."

The Corinthian order in architecture is ascribed to Callimachus.

The Columbia Theatre.

San Francisco theatre-goers will welcome "Mr. Pim Passes By," which opens at the Columbia Monday evening. New York singled it out as one of the few really worth-while plays of the year.

"Mr. Pim Passes By" has such unusual situations that it keeps the audience in a good humor throughout the evening. The scene is laid in the home of George Marden. His wife, Olivia, played by Miss Laura Hope Crews, in her teens had married a company promoter out in Australia who had wound up in jail, where he died. Save for a slight difference over the engagement of their niece, the Mardens are living happily until along comes Mr. Pim, an old gentleman from Australia of a forgetful frame of mind. He drops a remark which indicates that Olivia's first husband is not dead after all. In the end the entanglements are all unraveled by Mr. Pim, and the Mardens settle down once more to a calm and peaceful rural life. To miss Mr. Pim is to miss one of the real joys of the theatre. During the Columbia Theatre engagement there will be Wednesday and Saturday matinées, but no Sunday evening performances.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Harry Carroll, one of America's youngest and most successful song composers, is coming to the Orpheum with a song and dance revue called "Varieties of 1922." Mr. Carroll's company includes ten artists of exceptional ability as dancers and singers.

A violin in proper hands possesses a sense of humor. Of course, the instrument must be in the hands of a comedian as well as a musician, and this is what Jack Denny is. He plays a little, gags a great deal, and keeps his audience thoroughly amused.

Ed Flanagan has deserted pictures and is back in vaudeville with Alex Morrison, who is best known as a golf expert. They call their act "A Lesson in Golf." Real golf balls are used and shots are made in full view of the audience. Mr. Morrison is the instructor and Mr. Flanagan the pupil. One of the features of the act is that while Morrison seems to be teaching the game to Flanagan, he is also giving many in the audience a few pointers they probably have overlooked.

"The Show-Off" mirrors a funny character, a $32-a-week clerk who is married and forced by circumstances to accept an apartment offered him by his wife's mother. He is one of those fellows who talk big and show off for company. This part is admirably played by Fred Sumner.

Grace Nelson is an American-made prima donna, and experts in music claim that her voice has been perfectly developed.

Jimmy Savo, assisted by Joan Franza, presents "A Salvo of Screams."

Niobe and her fish remain. Her voice is quite audible in all parts of the theatre, though she is submerged.

The Gladenbacks in "White, Black, and White" will create a sensation.

The world sustains a loss in the death of Frederick Villiers, who died in London a few days ago, at the age of sixty-nine, after a long illness. The work of the famous war correspondent and artist has appeared in the London Graphic and Illustrated News. He was an observer of twenty-one conflicts, starting with the Russo-Turkish war in 1878, and ending with the world war, during which he passed two and a half years at the front. Mr. Villiers' most recent book, an autobiography entitled "Frederick Villiers: His Five Decades of Adventure" was published last year by the Harpers. He was the model for Kipling's war-artist hero in "The Light That Failed."

RECOGNIZING RUSSIA.

Charles William Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, has this to say in the New York Times on the question of the right time to recognize Russia:

"Our National Administration is apparently acting on the belief that the American people wish to avoid entering into European politics, though willing to join in economic measures for the restoration of European industries and European national budgets and credits. I submit that this separation of politics and economics is not expedient, or even possible, in the case of Russia.

"The fundamental proposition on which the Bolshevik government was based is, to be sure, an economic one, namely, no private property, no family property, and no transmission of property in a family; but on that foundation a political government was suddenly created by savage violence on the part of a small minority of the population, and that government proceeded to rob and kill a considerable proportion of the property-holders of the country, large and small, and finally to rob and enslave the labor employed in the manufacturing industries of the country. This same government undertook to win the support of the agricultural peasantry by giving them delusive deeds of the lands they had been accustomed to cultivate as tenants; but the great agricultural class, while they accepted these deeds, refused to accept or support the Bolshevik government. That government has also crushed completely, both physically and morally, the educated middle class in Russia, which has not only been deprived of its property, but of all intercourse with thinking people in neighboring nations and in America also.

"This Bolshevik government now finds itself in dire straits, without credit, and without power to reconstruct Russian factories or Russian transportation; and yet it still insists at Genoa and elsewhere on all its monstrous social and economic fallacies, and proposes that other governments or peoples shall lend it billions of dollars without any security whatever for the repayment of the loans.

"I submit that the United States should neither forget nor forgive the monstrous crimes, cruelties, and follies of this Bolshevik government, and should wait to give aid to Russia, except food for the starving, until that government is dead and buried. In this sense, and in regard to this nation, it seems to me impossible to separate, in American national action, European politics from European economics. The American democracy should not only take to heart the lessons of the Bolshevik horror for the present generation, but should do its full part in making and recording the history of the Bolshevik crime to the end of the chapter.

"In that course of conduct the present Administration can rely on the well-nigh unanimous support of the American people, who heartily detest the political as well as the economic theories of Bolshevism."

The Aeroplane's Small Boat.

Going "ashore," or rather down to earth, in a little gliding "airboat" which will cast off and sail down from a big air liner, without the latter's stopping to alight, is to be the unique experience of travelers on the great Eastern airway which the German-Russian air combine are now organizing over the 5000 miles between Moscow and Vladivostok. Exceptionally large, high-flying, metal-built aircraft, which will climb with much expenditure of engine-power to their chosen altitude and will then sweep on at that prescribed height, are to be employed on the route, but it is desired, at the same time, to encourage as much intermediate traffic as possible. Hence the scheme of "setting down" travelers by "airboat" at any quite small, lonely landing ground, in addition to the scheduled stoppages of the big machine at important centres along this airway, says the Manchester Guardian.

These little airboats, or tenders, will be engineless, having four seats for passengers behind a wind screen, and a seat out forward in which an operator sits in order to guide and control the machine during its smooth glide earthward. At the rear of the passengers' seats is a locker, or compartment, for mails and urgent parcels. When carried in the big luggage-hold of the air liner, provision is made for the wings of the airboat to be detached and placed in racks, thus economizing space.

The actual slipping, or launching, will be simplicity itself. After a "boat" has been lowered on its special tackle below the hull of the air liner, its passengers and steersman in their places, the officer in charge of the "liner" will ring down to his engine-room, reducing speed until the big machine is moving forward at a pace just sufficient to enable the wings of the little hanging airboat to support their load in a gentle downward glide. The steersman of the airboat, by the movement of a lever beside him, will open the "triggers" of the tackle holding the boat by wings and tail, and the little machine will take up its own individual flight. The passengers, looking upward, will see the mother vessel forge ahead with gathering speed, while they, in their little motorless glider, go "tobogganing" downhill through the air till the steersman has brought them to rest at their destination.

Fourth Los Gatos Pageant.

The people of Los Gatos are preparing to make their fourth annual bow to the valley. This time they will present the "Pageant of Fulfillment" on the evenings of Friday and Saturday, June 23d and 24th.

Wilbur Hall, well-known magazine writer, author and producer of the pageant, is supported by a cast of 300 townspeople who have taken part in previous pageants, a large chorus of trained voices, and a group of seventy fancy dancers led by Vivian Amet Johnston.

Among the most effective features of the pageant are the gift of Fire, a meteor which descends from Heaven to earth to dance with Youth; the return of the cave men from battle, bearing their spoils and singing a barbaric paen of victory; the torch dance of forty men; the sudden appearance of the Indians from the ambush of the hills, coming down to do their Dance of the Plenteous Harvest; the Emigrant Train, a faithful reproduction of early days, and the Blossom Dance.

Visitors to Los Gatos are amazed at the vigor of the community spirit aroused by this undertaking; people are giving unstintingly of their time, their money, or their talents, and the result will be a spectacle of even greater beauty and artistry than the three previous pageants, all of which delighted the public.

This year's pageant will be free for all. There will be reserved seats for those who desire them at one dollar each, but every one will be equally welcome, and the people of Los Gatos are hospitably preparing for an audience of 10,000 people.

Dean Inge Grows Gloomier.

Champions of the "good old days" are no new thing, but Dean Inge of St. Paul's Cathedral, who because of his lucubrations has earned the title of "the gloomy dean," has new evidence of present-day degeneracy when compared with the Victorian era, says the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

"Let those who are disposed to follow the present evil fashion of disparaging the great Victorians make a collection of their heads in photographs and engravings," said the dean, "and compare them with those of their little favorites. Let them set up in row good portraits of Tennyson, Charles Darwin, Gladstone, Manning, Newman, Martineau, Lord Lawrence, Burne-Jones, and, if they like, a dozen lesser luminaries, and ask themselves candidly whether men of this stature are any longer among us."

The result of Dean Inge's general condemnation of modern men has been interesting. The London papers in following up the question have published comparative photographs of the dean's heroes and big figures of today like Lloyd George, H. G. Wells, Earl Balfour, and Rudyard Kipling. Skilled analysts of character have dissected the results and after most painstaking researches have decided that the great and fundamental difference is nothing in the world but "whiskers."

So far no one has had the temerity to ask Dean Inge if the great loss he bemoaned was that of hirsute adornment for the manly face so popular sixty years ago.

The First Nurse.

Feminine benevolent associations in France have been asking themselves who, in history, was the first nurse. They have searched the Bible, where, to be sure, there is mention of wet nurses, but not nurses for the sick, says the New York Tribune. The first nurse is said to have been Fabiola, a Roman woman, who, after her conversion to Christianity, founded a hospital and house of convalescence for the poor. She created an association of women whom she formed to the profession of sick nurses.

The nurses, who were called sister, in remembrance of religious traditions, were, in 1544, treated as lay persons, when twelve women were engaged in the St. Bartholomew Hospital of London to tend to the sick and perform inferior work. It was not until 1790 that at the Hospital of New York physicians began to teach the nurses medical cleanliness. Their first school they had in Germany in 1836 and it required the influence of Florence Nightingale, the famous nurse of the Crimean war, to give in England to the profession of nurse the moral authority which they have since possessed.

Asked how a certain state dinner under the Hayes administration had gone off, William M. Evarts replied: "Excellent. The water flowed like champagne."

The School of Nursing of St. Luke's Hospital will hold its commencement exercises for the class of 1922 on June 22d, at 3 p. m.

Bunker Hill Celebration.

A musical programme will be rendered by the Golden Gate Park Band, under the leadership of Professor Cassasa, in honor of the 147th anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill. The exercises will take place Saturday, June 17th, in Golden Gate Park, at 2 p. m. A special feature will be the rendering of the song, "The Sword of Bunker Hill," by soloists of the park band. All citizens are invited to attend.

VANITY FAIR.

The recent arrival from New York was speaking. "It cost me 18 cents," he said, "to cross on your ferry this morning—I had to come over early on business—but I feel as though I owed three dollars more. That's what I pay for a seat at Flo Ziegfeld's Follies when I'm feeling foolish, but there were prettier girls and more of them in the cabin of the ferryboat this morning than Ziegfeld ever got together on his stage. There was a blonde in a pale blue hat that would make a poster for selling ice-cream to the Eskimos, and she'd sell 'em, too. There was a brunette in black, with black hair and eyebrows—not just brown, but crow black, and she would have made Fifth Avenue turn around to look. There was a sort of mezzotint, or mezzanine, or whatever you call it, with blonde hair and brown eyes and naturally red cheeks, and it was hard to turn the attention anywhere else. And they were all tall; you know? I mean that there seemed to be enough of each one, no half portions—they looked as though they had been eating well ever since they were born. And complexions—but why go on? There must have been fifty good lookers on that boat, any one of whom would have earned her salary just carrying a spear in a Broadway show. And they had fine manners and graceful ways of carrying themselves. Why, it was a delight just to see one of them sneeze. I know why so few girls shows come to San Francisco from our burg: too much competition. They'd drive a Turk crazy. And I judge from the time of day they were office girls, business women, stenographers. That's queer. It isn't on the ferry alone—they're all about your business streets, and in your stores and offices. You may be used to it, but to me it's one beauty show. I certainly feel that I owe three dollars more, but I don't know to whom. Maybe it's the climate."

It appears that Lady Astor is not the only Englishman afraid of a division of political parties into male and female. Here's Joseph Austen Chamberlain speaking to women Unionists in a vein of repressed apprehension about it, like a person who thinks he can abolish ghosts by denying that there are any. Comment on his speech goes farther than the speech itself, which for obvious reasons of caution could not concede the danger against which it was a warning, for fear of precipitating what it wished to avert. In the hope of throwing the matter into the field of the ridiculous, some commentators satirically declare that it would be just as much a calamity, and just as likely, if political parties should divide on a basis of pigmentation, by which is not meant the mentality of pigs, but the relative amount of color in skin, eyes, hair, "and such"; if no blonde elector would vote for a brunette, male or female, for example, and vice versa. This would indeed add complications to English politics, right in the midst of the Irish trouble, which Heaven knows is troublesome enough and has enough surprising mutations without this. How could they carry on Genoa conferences or Egyptian emancipation or Zionism or hands-across-the-Baltic with the Bolsheviks, if parties were to be continuously flip-flopping from blonde to brunette and back to blonde, if international questions were to be disturbed in process of solution by conflicts between the sanguine and the melancholic temperaments, as they used to be classified? Even sex war has been mentioned as an imagined possibility between imagined male and female parties. Some confidence that things will not become as bad as that, however, grows from the reflection that a difficulty of conducting every conflict is the tendency of the troops to fraternize with the enemy. In this case fraternization would hardly be the word; say, rather, connubiate. Proposals across party lines would be demoralizing to discipline of any soldierly sort. In the case of captured prisoners, difficulties would present themselves that no amount of exchanging would overcome. And when it came to conducting retreats, perhaps neither side could be trusted to run as fast as it should.

Dan Rooney recently arrived at Atlantic City from Ireland, and after a stroll on the Board Walk decided he would like to "become married," as the Frenchman said. He did not know any particular person, apparently was not one himself, and a friend told him the way to go about it was just to pick one out and seize her. So he went over to the City Hall, and after an hour or so spent in critical inspection of the sex, he decided that he had wasted enough of the springtime of life and threw his arms around the next girl that came along. She proved to be an Amazon of prowess, with a well-developed triceps and a bulk that made a good resistance post, and she hung one on Mr. Rooney's jaw that would have cracked a brick. And she did not forget to scream, which attracted the notice of another person who had come from Ireland, but long enough before to get on the force. He ran Mr. Rooney in. The recorder, which is the Jersey name for judge, at least in the lower courts, told the impetuous wooer that he would be ninety days older when he again saw the Board Walk, and in the meantime he could keep in condition by dividing stones. Here, we submit, is a good opening for a scenario. The lady disappears from the record; but who can doubt that she will, unless previously engaged, be found hanging about the jail yard toward the end of the ninety days, waiting for her soul-mate to emerge? Why, it is as good as done. The raw material of a husband is there, and he is half subdued already. A few more jolts like that and he will be qualified to engage in that domestic life for which he seems to have so strong and so reckless a predilection.

The case of Mr. Valentino, male movie beauty, has been recently in the courts and in the papers in a manner to outrage the feelings of the whole Bosom Heavers', Fist Clenchers', and Face Makers' Union. The sacred right of a member of that union to marry as early and often as he or she might wish has been brutally invaded by a soulless and inartistic court of law, which has dared to impose upon Mr. Valentino's liberty the heartless condition that he shall not enjoy what the feller called "martial relations" with his interlocutory wife. The interlocutory wife is the effect of a Mexican marriage, contracted, or attempted, while the interlocutory decree of divorce granted the first wife had run but about half its prescribed course. It seemed that when Mr. Valentino was in the United States he was married to one woman, and when he was in Mexico he was married to a totally different one. This arrangement gave him fresh air and change, so necessary to the growth and functioning of the artistic spirit. As he could not be in two countries at once, it seems to have been a diluted form of bigamy, if any. In fact, as his second marriage was only legal in Mexico, he had to go to Mexico to be a bigamist at all, and there it was no distinction. And as Mexico did not care a darn about his first marriage, it is not certain that he was a bigamist even there. At any rate, when he returned to California he became thereby and automatically, so to speak, as pure as the driven snow; a poor devil with only one wife, and that the first one. To the rational mind, such an arrangement must seem, though something of a hardship in such a case as this, both virtuous and convenient. The court did not see it so, and thrust the clumsy fingers and thumbs of the law into the most sacred of human relationships—that of husband and wives. The decision affects every sailor on the seven seas. It would have put Jim Bludsoe safe ashore behind bars, he who had "one wife here in Memphis, and one in Natchez-under-the-Hill." Mr. Valentino has to be good, in the American misunderstanding of the term, while his first, or American, wife goes about making movies under his name for the balance of the year, and declining to have anything else to do with him. Poor Valentino! Neither in Los Angeles nor in Mexico can he find domestic peace, and all because of Thomas Lee Woolwine. Of course, he could have avoided his present plight had he but observed the rule of Bill Nye—"One country, one God, and one wife at a time." But that is now the wisdom of the ancients. It has little to do with the movie business.

Up in Eureka they are crabbing about the San Francisco crab boat. They do not like to have their crabs taken for the San Francisco market, and say that just because we have eaten all our crabs is no reason why we should eat up theirs. That sounds sensible. One ought to receive some compensation for having to live in Eureka, and good crabs are almost enough. In this region they are too small and flavorless, in addition to being too high in price. But small or large, the crabs on this coast are the most delicious shellfish to be found anywhere. The lobster of Atlantic waters does very well for those that have never tasted Pacific Coast crabs. After that, lobsters are tame. As for the Eastern soft-shell crab, as served in hotels and restaurants and anywhere else, it has too strong a resemblance to a fried paper bag. The real San Francisco gourmet has nothing but pity for his Eastern colleague when trying to find the meat in it.

In Great Britain woman has arrived most triumphantly in the matter of medical responsibility, according to the New York Tribune. Every hospital there has one woman surgeon on the permanent staff to every five men, and in those which pay special attention to the ailments of women and children there are five women surgeons against one man. This country lags far behind this record, though it can boast of some of the most prosperous and successful medical practitioners in the world. The first woman to receive a license to practice medicine in the United States was Elizabeth Blackwell of Brooklyn, who made her studies in the medical school of Geneva, New York, and received the degree of M. D. in 1849. She went to New York City and began to practice her profession. But she was coolly received, and so meagrely supported that she accepted an offer from a London physician, and went to that city to take up one division of his big practice. She achieved both fame and fortune in London, and could have returned in triumph to her American home, but she declined to do so. One of the treasures of the Army Medical Museum of Washington, D. C., is the original diploma given to Fraulein Dorothea Christiana Erleben by the University of Halle in 1754, and which recites in grandiose terms that she had made all requisite studies and was therefore a medical doctor of deep erudition and sound attainment. The degree was signed by the various authorities of the university and by the King of Prussia, who was likewise the Elector of Brandenburg. Dr. Erleben was the first woman to study medicine in all of Germany, and she obtained much celebrity in general practice.

The latest word-coinage up to date is "optience." It designates a moving picture "audience," the latter word being inaccurate as applied to see-ers rather than hearers.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

David Bispham met Oliver Herford in London and in the course of conversation remarked on the fact that as yet London had no skyscrapers. "Pity, too," said Herford. "I never saw a sky that needed scraping more."

It seems there is a German "bull" as well as an Irish. Here is a specimen, from the Crown Prince's Memoirs. Von Bethman Hollweg remarks to Herr Ballin of the Hamburg American: "I only wish I were dead." And Herr Ballin replies: "I dare say you do. No doubt it would suit you admirably to lie in your coffin all day and watch other people toiling and worrying."

This story is told of Alfred Austin, one-time poet laureate of England. A lady who had never heard of him sat next him at dinner and tried in vain to keep the conversation afloat. Then she discovered by a stray reference of Mr. Austin's that he was a literary man. The lady had an inspiration and brightly blurted, "You've written a good deal, Mr. Austin. Are you a son of Jane Austen, the novelist?"

An old Scotch minister who tried to indoctrinate his congregation with a belief in a fire and brimstone hell was preaching an appropriately heated sermon. His most cogent argument ran as follows: "And on the last day, when ye'll be surrounded by roarin' flames in a sea of brimstone ye'll cry out to the Lord, 'Oh, Lor-rd, we did not know—we did not know!' And the infinitely mairciful Lor-rd will say, 'Weel, ye ken the noo!'"

A Parisian taxicab driver had the bright idea of pasting on his car the announcement, "English spoken." One of his confrères entered competition. His car was soon decorated with the sign, "American spoken." The first chauffeur was indignant. Said the second, "There are now in Paris more Americans than English and they are flattered when they hear their native tongue." The other sneeringly remarked, "And I suppose you speak it?" "Sir, I've been six months in Brazil," was the confident reply.

John B. Gough, temperance lecturer, was holding forth on the beauties of prohibition. He expressed a prayerful wish that all the alcoholic beverages in the country could be miraculously poured into the sea. His audience was unresponsive. Mr. Gough had the unhappy realization that it was not with him. Then a voice from the gallery shouted, "Amen! Hurray! Amen!" "Thank Heaven!" cried John B. Gough. "There is one righteous man among us. Are you a staunch teetotaler, friend?" "Nix," said the man in the gallery. "I'm a diver."

A man carrying a heavy valise crossed the Nevsky Prospekt. He was stopped by a commissioner who asked him what he was carrying. "Rubles," said the man, and he was arrested and examined. He insisted the money was his own and was released on bail of one million rubles. A few days later he was again arrested and was released on two million rubles bail. The third time he was arrested the authorities said, "This time you will have to come across with ten millions." The man promised the immense fine if he were allowed two days' respite. It was granted, and true to his word he came at the appointed hour dragging a heavy trunk. "Here are the ten millions," he announced. "I have also brought the printing press. It will be easier for you."

The Days of '49 celebration at Sacramento in May was one of the best frolics any city ever staged, and some persons that attended say it was not altogether dry. A story is going around about two Volstead Act agents detailed from Los Angeles to enforce prohibition. They were drafted from a distance so that they would be unknown. But the story goes that when these expert breath sniffers and cellar searchers stepped off the train a bearded stage robber of Bret Harte days said, "Throw up yer hands," and backed it with a wicked old cap-and-ball six-shooter. He took their weapons, their jewelry, their money, their credentials, everything but their clothes. They had to wire San Francisco for money to eat, and had a hard time getting enough credit for that. For every one else the celebration was a complete success.

Sir James Lenham relates a host of anecdotes in his "Memoirs of the Memorable." Here is the reason why the name and precedence of judges' wives in Scotland have been altered: "The Mackintosh of Mackintosh told me an excellent story. You must know that, until recent years, when a Scotch lawyer (whom we will call Mr. McIntyre of Glenlawe) was elevated to the bench, he was not called Mr. Justice McIntyre, as with us, but, taking his title from his place, he appeared as Lord Glenlawe, yet his unfortunate wife was still only Mrs. McIntyre. A certain well-known Scotch judge and his wife went abroad, and, of course, appeared in the hotel lists as Lord Glenlawe and Mrs. McIntyre. The Mackintosh, seeing him next year, said, 'I suppose you're off to Switzerland soon?' 'Switzerland!' rejoined the judge; 'I'll never set foot there again. I was turned out of three hotels for immorality! Bonnie Scotland's guid eno' for me!'"

Walter Damrosch has incensed musical England by his declaration that modern English music is ugly. Apropos of his accusation the famous New Yorker told a story at a dinner in his home town. Two sailors were drinking in a sailors' tavern in a low part of London. "Listen, Bill," said one. Above the roar of the traffic a hard, loud voice could be heard. "Listen," the sailor went on tremulously. "He's singin' 'The Light of Other Days.' Aw, Bill, don't it bring back yer innercent childhood to ye—birds and flowers and yer prayers at yer mother's knee?" Bill gave a contemptuous laugh. "That aint 'The Light of Other Days,' mate. He's singin' 'Love Me and the World Is Mine.' The argument went on till Bill called a boy and said to him: "Run out, kid, and ask that bloke if he's singin' 'The Light of Other Days' or 'Love Me and the World Is Mine.'" The sailors waited the boy's return in sullen silence. Finally the messenger returned and disgustfully reported: "That there guy aint singin' nuthin' at all. He's peddling fish."

According to the latest census there are 6,448,336 farmers in the United States.

THE MERRY MUSE.

Getting-Rich-Quick.

(An extravagant dream induced by study of the free insurance schemes of various newspapers.)

That day good fortune haunted me:
My early morning cup of tea
Fell, scalding hot, upon my knee.

"Aha!" I cried, when I could speak;
"A happy chance! The Daily Shriek
Will pay me fifty pounds a week."

Shaving, I felt my razor slip
And cut me sharply on the lip.
"More cash!" I breathed. "The Morning Pip."

And when I skidded on the mat,
Knocking my nasal organ flat,
"The Wail," I said, "will pay for that."

A fish-bone, lodged inside my neck
Soon made of me a further wreck,
But meant a Sunday Cornet cheque.

"This is indeed The Day!" I said;
And, though I should have gone to bed,
I struggled off to work instead.

A motor swooped. I stumbled, fell;
And as it crashed—"The Evening Yell,"
I murmured, "pays extremely well."

I reached the station, breathless, late,
And crushed my elbow in the gate.
"The Lyre!" I quavered. "This is great."

A rending noise, a warning shout,
The roof collapsed. . . . They dug me out.
Rabbing "Insured!" The Daily Spout."

Softly they bore me home, and there,
Battered but joyful, free from care,
I lay in bed—a millionaire. —Punch.

Cultural San Francisco.

When a city is aware of itself it is glad. It plays creatively. It finds something better to do than merely to respond automatically to the stimuli of the mechanisms it has evolved to serve its own material needs, says James Rorty in the Nation. It wills life to be thus and so. It achieves a civilization and a culture—in the sense in which John Addington Symonds defines the word—"self-effectuation."

Will San Francisco ever be a cultural identity in that sense? It may, and the time may not be so far distant after all. For anything can happen in San Francisco—one feels that. The magnificent resurgence of the city after the fire is a thing not to be forgotten. And the Exposition was more than a grandiose gesture—it was a noble and heroic achievement. Some day the sunny sky of California will be darkened by a thought-cloud—it is possible to think in California, despite Mr. Mencken's picturesque assertions to the contrary. And out of that cloud will flicker lightnings with potentialities of illumination.

"Why not?" as the Serpent said in Bernard Shaw's new version of the Garden legend. "Why not?"

"I tell you," went on the elderly woman at the hotel, getting quite huffy, "I won't have this room. I aint going to pay my money for a place that isn't big enough to swing a cat, and for sleeping in one of them folding beds. I simply won't do it!" The boy could stand it no longer. "Get on in, mum," said he, with a weary expression on his face. "This aint your room; it's the lift."—Edinburgh Scotsman.

Produced Under the New HEXEON Process

ADDING A NEW CHAPTER TO THE BOOK OF ACHIEVEMENT

How We Overcame the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

The announcement of the engagement of Mrs. Lloyd Huff to General Charles Morton was made last week at a dinner given by Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Bovard of Greensburg, Pennsylvania, at the Rolling Rock Country Club near Ligonier. Close upon the announcement of the engagement followed the marriage, on Wednesday, June 14th, at Grace Episcopal Church in New York. Immediately after the ceremony General and Mrs. Morton started for California. They are expected here on June 20th and will sail the following week for Alaska on their wedding tour. Mrs. Morton was the widow of former Congressman George H. Huff of Cabin Hill, Greensburg, Pennsylvania. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Moorehead of Greensburg, Pennsylvania. Mrs. John Stewart and Miss Elizabeth Huff are daughters of Mrs. Morton, and Miss Huff is to make her home with her mother at Fort Mason. Several affairs are planned in honor of General and Mrs. Morton for the few days between their arrival and their departure.

The engagement of Miss Lorraine Brown to Mr. Robert E. Anderson, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Anderson, has been announced. Miss Brown is the niece of Mr. John A. Hooper, with whom she makes her home. The news of the betrothal was told at a dinner party given at the Hooper home on Laguna Street, and at an affair given on the campus at Stanford University, of which Miss Brown is a graduate, of the class of 1918. Mr. Anderson is also a graduate, with the class of 1913. No definite announcement as to the date of the wedding has been made.

On Saturday evening, June 10th, Miss Berenice Mitchell became the bride of Mr. Garston Keyston at the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Mitchell became the bride of Mr. Garton Keyston. San Jose performed the ceremony. The bridal attendants were Miss Annette Rolph, Miss Helen Brack, Miss Marian Mitchell, and Miss Lenore Morrissey. The matron of honor, Mrs. Otto Grau, and the maid of honor, Miss Sallie Obeare, led the bridesmaids in the procession. Following the ceremony, a buffet supper was served. Mr. and Mrs. Keyston went on a short wedding tour, and will spend the remainder of the summer at Palo Alto.

The wedding of Miss Mary Alice Moon to Lieutenant Arthur Stuart Walton, U. S. N., will take place June 29th at the Hotel Utah in Salt Lake City. Owing to the recent death of the bride's mother, Mrs. Clinton I. Moon, the ceremony will be very quiet, only relatives and close friends being asked. Lieutenant Walton is stationed at the Bremerton Navy Yard, Washington, where the couple will make their home. Miss Moon is the niece of Mrs. M. I. Higgins of this city.

Mrs. William Kent is promoting a concert to be given on Friday evening, June 16th, in San Rafael, for the purpose of raising a fund for the rebuilding and restoring of the Presbyterian Orphanage, which was recently destroyed by fire.

Mrs. Kent will be assisted by Mrs. Ernest Chipman, Mrs. John Selfridge, Mrs. Almer Newhall, Mrs. Ralph Palmer, Mrs. Paul Foster, Mrs. Thomas Kent, Mrs. Raymond Thayer, and Mrs. Milton Esberg. The concert is to be in charge of Mr. Uda Waldrop. A number of boxes have already been taken for the affair.

Mrs. Paul Fagan entertained at a luncheon at the Francisca Club in honor of Mrs. James J. Fagan, Jr. The marriage of Mrs. James Fagan was a recent affair, and took place at Sacramento, the news coming as a surprise to their friends. Before her marriage Mrs. Fagan was Miss Dorothy Gebhardt. Mrs. Paul Fagan had as her guests at the luncheon Miss Doris Fagan, Miss Frances Lent, Miss Annette Rolph, Miss Helen Brack, Miss Cornelia Gwynn, and Miss Newell Bull.

At a luncheon at which Miss Doris Fagan entertained for her sister-in-law at the Menlo Country Club Miss Annette Rolph, Miss Virginia Cumming, Miss Nance Obeare, Miss Barbara Willett, Miss Katherine Stoney, Miss Helen Brack, Miss Sallie Obeare, Miss Miriam Trowbridge, Miss Audrye Willett, and Miss Helen Lee were the guests.

In honor of Miss Elva Ghirardelli, who in September is to become the bride of Mr. John Welby Dinsmore, Mrs. Ward Dawson entertained at tea at her home in Piedmont. The guests were received by Mrs. Harry Hush Magee, Mrs. Monroe Greenwood, Miss Elizabeth Magee, and Miss Katherine Maxwell assisting Mrs. Dawson. About a hundred friends called.

The circus for the benefit of the Stanford Home for Convalescents, held on Saturday on the Hahn estate, was a success, financially and for the pleasure it afforded both the participants and the spectators. With the circus in the afternoon the incentive many luncheon parties preceded it. Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Hamilton entertained several guests—Mr. and Mrs. George Newhall, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Hays Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Ross Ambler Curran, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hobart, Colonel and Mrs. Sidney Cloman, Mrs. Walter Filer, and Captain C. G. Lyman.

Commodore and Mrs. James H. Bull have issued invitations for a reception to be given on Saturday evening, June 24th, at their home on Jackson Street in honor of General and Mrs. Charles Morton.

A number of entertainments are planned in honor of Mrs. Frederick Sharon, who has recently returned from a year's absence. Mrs. James Ward Keeney entertained at a luncheon at her home on Buchanan Street for Mrs. Sharon last week, and Mr. and Mrs. Ross Ambler Curran gave a dinner for her at their home in Burlingame. Mrs. Sharon spent the week-end at Alma as the guest of her brother, Dr. Harry Tevis, who is entertaining a house party.

Mr. Samuel Hill of Seattle, Washington, who accompanied Marshal and Mme. Joffre on their recent trip and was their host from the time they left Japan throughout their tour of America until they again reached French soil, gave a luncheon recently at the Hotel Plaza-Athénée in Paris, when Marshal and Mme. Joffre were his guests of honor. The other guests included Mr. and Mrs. Edward Tuck, Mr. and Mrs. Amos Tuck French, Marquis and Marquise de Chambrun, Mrs. Alexandre de Brettville, and Mrs. Adolph B. Spreckels.

CURRENT VERSE.

To a Russian Dancer, Mad.

(Suggested by a report of his madness.)

They say that he who made Petrouchka live
And die in a madhouse now in Spain,
Nor in Scheherazade will ever give
His wild abandon to the dance again.
The favari negre is dead; and that lithe Faun Which, through the sun-drenched slither afternoon,
Watched the nymphs glide upon the amber lawn,
No more will fright them from their sport too soon.

And when night's stage is lit by flaring stars,
With clown-white face and witless gestures creeps,
Through the black grating, brushing the moonlit bars,
Mad Harlequin; Pierrot chatters and weeps,
Moon struck. Narcisse, his form a wind-torn flower,
Shedding the lustre of his star-like face,
Stagers and droops, while he who gave them power

Of life, forgets his beauty and his grace
Which was their breath of being. Now they seem Only a host of memories wan, and fleet
Fantastic puppets of a poet's dream
Whose sleep has stirred the motion of their feet.
With postures strange and movements out of time,
They greet the Dawn—in frantic pantomime.

—T. F. S. in Life.

The Dancers

Ours was a quiet town, a still town, a sober town,
Softly curled the yellow roads that slept in the sun,
Staid came the day and staid came the night down
And staidly went we sleepwise when the day's work was done!

Oh, they came dancing down, the gay ones, the bonny ones.

We had never seen the like, sweet and wild and glad,
Down the long road they came, fluting and dancing.
Flowers in each lass's hair and plumes on each lad!

Sweet were their clinging hands, kind were their voices,

"Dance with us, laugh with us, good grave folk," said they,

"Swift we must go from you, time's long for toiling, Come and make joy with us the brief while we stay!"

Oh, then was a gay time, a wild time, a glad time,
Hand in hand we danced with them beneath sun and moon,

Flowers were for garlanding and greens were for dancing—

This was the wisdom we learned of them too soon!

Swift went the day past, a glad day, a wild day,
Swift went the night past, a night wild and glad,

Down fell their arms from us, loosening, fleeting
Far down the roads they danced, wild lass and wild lad!

Far fled their dancing feet, far rang their laughter,

Far gleamed their mocking eyes beneath the garlands gay,

All too late we knew them then, the wild eyes, the elf-eyes,

Wood-folk and faun-folk that danced our hearts away!

Ours is a still town, a sad town, a sober town,
Still lie the dun roads all empty in the sun,

Sad comes the day up and sad walls the night down,
And sadly go we sleepwise when the day's watch is done!

—Margaret Widdemer in "Poems of the Dance."

A Baptist minister, who was six feet three, had two candidates for baptism, one a very tall woman who almost rivaled the minister's height, and the other a very short man. The minister took the towering lady by the arm and told the little man to follow them. They approached the edge of the stream. The minister and the lady walked into the stream till it was about waist high, when they heard some improper tittering from the spectators on the bank. Looking around they discovered the short candidate for baptism swimming after them.

Did Leonardo Name America?

Again the origin of the name America is in question, the New York Tribune remarks. Hitherto it has been generally supposed that Martin Waldseemüller of St. Die first applied it to the Western Continent. But now Professor W. Harrington, after long research, asserts that Leonardo da Vinci gave this name.

In 1507, after Columbus' death, declares Professor Harrington, Martin Waldseemüller published a book in which he asked that the new continent, which has been visited four times by Amerigo Vespucci, should be named by the latter.

The first map of the country discovered by Columbus, printed in Rome in 1508, bore only the mention "New World." Likewise a second edition published in Strassburg in 1509.

And it was the map made by Leonardo da Vinci in 1514 which, for the first time, bore the name of America.

San Francisco Now Claims the Country's Largest and Finest Knit Goods Store

Unique among America's great retail establishments is the new and greater "Knit Shop" of Gantner & Mattern Co. at Geary and Grant Ave. The circumstance that this corner is in the busiest, high-class retail district in the entire West was largely responsible for the magnificent display windows, which are the last word in refined and artistic facilities for the display of high-grade merchandise.

While making the extensive changes necessitated by taking over the space formerly occupied by a jewelry concern, it was decided to make many other alterations in the main premises in keeping with the beauty of the new addition. The result of all this is a store that ranks first among the palatial establishments for which the new San Francisco retail district is justly famous. Needless to say, every modern facility for giving prompt and efficient service is installed; departments that had outgrown their capacity now possess ample accommodations; roomier aisles obviate unpleasant crowding, even on "Sale" days. Owing to the large, plate-glass fronts extending through the entire five floors of the building, every department is flooded with daylight; to provide for short and gloomy winter days, an elaborate sunlight lighting system makes the selection of colors and examination of fabrics most satisfactory.

At Del Monte.

The annual Girls' Swimming Carnival at Del Monte, on June 23d to 25th, gives promise of attracting a fashionable gathering on the lawns and at the solarium of the open-air Roman Plunge. This feature, which will bring the fastest mermaids in California, has in the past provided many interesting contests for the spectators. An added attraction this year will be the Pacific Association of the A. A. U. championships at diving and for the fifty-yard race.

Del Monte is to be gay over the week-end with ten to twelve special trains bringing Shriners and Rotarians to visit the scenic and historic points of interest on the Monterey Peninsula. An elaborate programme of entertainment has been mapped out by the citizens of Monterey and Del Monte. After the Shrine convention at San Francisco there will be many other visitors come to Del Monte to enjoy the many pleasures offered.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Hunter and their children of Berkeley have occupied their home at Monterey and will spend much of the summer here. Mr. Hunter is an expert golfer who devoted much of his time on the Del Monte and Pebble Beach golf courses.

Colonel and Mrs. J. Hudson Poole with their children have occupied their remodeled home at Pebble Beach, and intend spending the summer months there.

Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton C. Rolfe of Seattle are making a visit to Del Monte.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard J. O. Culver and Mr. and Mrs. William B. Bohn are among the Los Angeles people visiting Del Monte.

Polo, which heretofore has been played in California almost exclusively during the winter season, is to come in for attention this summer at Del Monte. Harry Hunt, one of the promising young players of San Mateo, has sent his string of spirited ponies, and intends spending a greater portion of the summer here to engage in games with the Del Monte and Monterey Presidio players.

W. W. Crocker, who with his sister, Miss Helen Crocker, has a beautiful villa at Pebble Beach, has gone in for the game enthusiastically and will probably make his appearance in the saddle at Del Monte shortly. Lawrence McCreery and Dick Schwerin are two other players from San Mateo who have been practicing with Hugh Drury or Eric Pedley, Del Monte stars, in anticipation of the coming matches.

Thomas Henry Oxnard, vice-president of the American Sugar Company and a leader in the development of the sugar-beet industry in California, died at New York on June 8th, aged sixty-two years. He is survived by his widow, Mrs. Marie Pichon Oxnard, of Upperville, Virginia; three daughters, Adeline and Nadine Oxnard, of Upperville, Virginia, and Marie Oxnard, of San Francisco, and two sons, Ben Oxnard, of Savannah, Georgia, and Robert Oxnard vice-president of the American Beet Sugar Company of San Francisco.

The Senate Privileges and Elections Committee is considering plans to check large election expenditures.

A Germanized Russia.

In books, pamphlets, articles, too numerous to mention, says J. Ellis Barker in the June Forum, German expansionists have demanded the creation of a greater Germany stretching from the Rhine to the Bering Strait, and from the North Pole to the borders of Persia, India, and China, from the North Sea to the Pacific. A Russo-German Empire may conceivably arise, and it may prove a very serious danger to the peace of Europe. The Russians have hitherto proved as wax in the hands of conquerors. Their national character has not changed. No other nation in the world would have patiently borne the misrule of the Czars and of the Bolsheviks. If the Russians were given a good government and administration, the population of the country should double and treble very speedily, its wealth should increase amazingly, and its military power should become almost irresistible. A Russo-German empire would dominate the two most populous continents of the world.

Colonel Harvey D. Loveland, member of the California State Railroad Commission, died at San Francisco on June 11th, aged sixty-nine. He was the oldest member of a public utility commission in the United States, and was appointed by Governor Gillett in 1907. He is survived by his widow, Mrs. Lulu Loveland, and a son, W. J. Loveland, of Berkeley. Harvey A. Loveland of Oakland is his nephew.

From Hannibal, Missouri, old home of Mark Twain, comes the news that Becky Thatcher, known to thousands of readers as the little schoolgirl in the adventures of Tom Sawyer and Huckleberry Finn, is a real person and is living today. She is Mrs. Laura Frazier, eighty-six years old, and is matron of the Home for the Friendless in Hannibal. It is said that Mrs. Frazier knows more about Mark Twain's youth than any other living person. "Mark and I started going to school the same year," she says. "He was seven and I was six. Our houses were across the street from each other right here in Hannibal. Mark had long, golden curls hanging over his shoulders. He used to carry my books to school every morning and carry them home in the afternoon. And he'd treat me to apples and oranges and divide his candy with me. In the winter Mark spent most of his time on the ice. I couldn't skate, but he always arranged for me to go along. He used to push me along the ice on a split-bottom chair. He was a fine skater, too—in fact, he was good at anything he undertook. The first time I ever saw Mark was on a hot summer day. He came out of his house and started showing off, turning handsprings and cutting capers. His heel hit me and I was thrown to the ground and knocked unconscious. I recall hearing the children tell about how scared Mark was." Mrs. Frazier passed a week at Mark Twain's home at Stormfield, Connecticut, in 1908.

The custom of drinking liquors after dinner was common in Scotland before it was observed in England, as is evident from the following extract from the Farington Diary, dated September 23, 1801: "After the dinner was removed, before the fruit was put on, a case of liquors was placed before Mrs. Bell, who helped her guests to small glasses of Cherry Brandy—Lemon Brandy &c &c as they liked.—This is a Scottish custom & the Ladies partake of it."

HISTORY IN SURNAMES.

It is by no means every man who knows that in the name he bears there is probably an interesting and valuable clue to his ancestry, writes Thornton Hall in John o' London's Weekly.

Thus, if he signs it Harcourt or Venables, Pelham or Percival, Dawney or Daubney, he may be pretty sure that the founder of his family had his cradling in Normandy—though whether he was a lord, a knight, or a scullion is hidden from him.

Similarly, if he bears the name of any town or village in England, of a surety that village or town was the cradle of his forefathers; though here, again, he gets no clue to the quality of his first bearer, who might be the lord of manors, or an honest tradesman or artisan. And when there are several places of the same name, often in different counties, he is still ignorant as to which of them he originally hails from.

Even when a man's surname throws no light on the place of origin, it often gives interesting clues to past history. Thus, if he is called Tanner or Glover, Butcher or Baker, Carter or Carpenter, he may know that the first of his forefathers to bear that name followed one or other of these occupations.

The first Thwaytes was a feller of wood; Jenner was a joiner; Milner, a miller; Webster, a weaver; Barker, a tanner; Lorimer, a maker of bits and spurs; and so on through the long list of old-time trades, many of them now scarcely identifiable by the average man—such as Stringer, a man who made bow-strings; Tipper, who tipped arrows; and Fletcher, who affixed the feathers.

When surnames throw no light on the place of origin, they occasionally reveal the situation of the original home. Thus, Tom who lived at the foot of the hill was labeled Underhill; if his home was on the shore, he was Tom-by-the-sea. And similarly we get such patronymics as Undercliff, Atwood, Atmoor, Byfield, and so on.

Other surnames tell us what kind of man were they who first bore them: Dark or Fair, Ruddy (Russell) or pale (Whiteman); whether they were "Long" or "Short" or "Broad"; "Merry" or "Sadd"; "Bold" or "Coward"; "Lightfoot" or "Heavyside."

When in those olden days there was no such way of distinguishing a man, it was an easy matter to identify him as his father's son. Thus, Richard's boys became known as Richardsons, William's as Williamsons, and Robin's as Robinsons. And when, in process of time, these labels grew too plentiful and confusing, the father's name was modified in other ways—to such an extent, indeed, that the connection is almost impossible to trace.

Even names which suggest no desirable lineage are often both ancient and honorable. Mr. Hobson can derive comfort from learning that, before the Conqueror set foot on our shores a Leoric Hobbesone figured among Saxon tenants in Suffolk. Mr. Buggins and Mr. Bangs will be relieved to find that their names "came over with the Normans"; and Mr. Snooks can point to Sevenoaks as the cradle of his family.

Among the difficulties facing the North Irish government is unemployment, says the Living Age. Well toward seventy thousand of all classes and creeds, including not less than eight thousand ex-service men, are out of work. This complicates the situation politically, because Catholic workers have been expelled from the shipyards by the Protestant workers. So long as the present unemployment continues, the argument is used that ex-service men shall have preference when new men are taken on by the works; and it chances that a large proportion of these are Protestants. It is predicted that when employment conditions are better in Belfast, the friction within labor ranks is likely to subside.

An ink known as "lovers' ink" was once sold in Paris. It was guaranteed to fade away in less than a month, so that letters written with it soon became worthless evidence. Later its sale was stopped by the police.

Crime Is in Danger.

The Sherlocks are here in force, the twenty-ninth annual convention of police chiefs has arrived and begun its sessions, and when we consider with what perspicacity and assiduity and penetration and vigilance their profession has devoted itself to its great task of public protection, as reflected in the programmes and proceedings, it would seem that if accounts of those proceedings and the thief-taking methods they expound could be sent to the crooks of the world they would instantly cease their especial activities and look for honest jobs. We fail to see how any of them could persist in their present labors. It looks as though the practice of crime had the poorest outlook and the greatest actual discouragements of any of the great professions, and as though an honest and frugal youth would be justified in choosing almost any other. The profits have been cruelly cut down, and exposure seems inevitable. Even punishment is sometimes administered by heartless judges before psychopaths can find a good excuse for the accused. As to the certainty of detection, that is demonstrated. The lie detector has appeared, and that was bad enough, but close on its heels come the vacuum cleaner and the compound microscope, into which it is only necessary for a real Sherlock to peek in order to reconstruct the whole personality of the criminal. For example, a man was badly "wanted." A choice lot of vacuum cleaner "sweepings" from his room was put under the microscope, and the pecker soon announced that the fugitive was an amateur botanist seventy years old, of spare build, with a Van Dyke beard, who frequented the neighboring hills and could often be found in the college library of the vicinity. And the man was found there. Sherlock Holmes could not touch it. Beard trimmings and a few seeds gave the case away; as the microscopist explained, if the man had been a professional botanist, he would not have brought his seed to his lodgings. The other items of the analysis are obvious. Of course, if the fugitive had been mending a hole in the curled hair mattress that morning our modern crystal gazer might have been led by the same line of reasoning to the conclusion that the culprit was a horse and could probably be found in some near-by pasture. But while such coincidences occur, they are rare, and microscopy and perspicacity can ordinarily be relied upon. It is wonderful. They are discussing murder, burglary, arson, finger prints, and the inspection of premises where crimes have been committed—the last an activity in which the police undoubtedly are experts. And still, incredible as it seems, crime goes on. And the old Kentuckian may have been justified who believed that the best college course for his son was triggerometry.

Youth Will Help.

The youth of California is a superb youth. Its spirit is vital and bold. It has developed in a family environment free from the bigoted restraints that cramp young people in older communities. It is accustomed to taking care of itself and doing things "on its own." Because it is free it has the greater self-respect and character. In most cases it can be trusted to do about the right thing, once its attention is called to what the right thing is. Its best representatives, collected in large numbers at Berkeley, are responding magnificently, which is the only word that expresses it, to the campaign of the Argonaut for a better direction to university activities. Most of the students remaining on the campus at this season have been talking for weeks about this paper's editorials on the resignation of President Barrows, and doing at least as much serious thinking as talking. Our information is that nothing in recent years has caused so much serious discussion in the student body, which is honestly searching itself to learn whether or not and how far large numbers of its members have been frivolling away the best part of their lives, and too much of their parents' money, in petting parties with ham-and-egg breakfasts and in jazz-band dances over the candy store, and whether the girls are really doing themselves any good by twinkling and dimpling their way through four years of pleasurable excitement and indulgence leading to a degree, in return for the funds set aside by the taxpayers of California for training the minds of the future mothers of the state.

This is an achievement in journalism. Here and there is a regent, or a faculty member, or an undergraduate, whose devotion is so blind that he or she feels we have laid impious hands upon a shrine. That is an old-world view. To the living heart of America there is nothing sacred unless it has a use, and a good use—nothing privileged except it contribute to the public welfare. But a large number, and we believe the majority, of those directly connected with the university are more inclined to support than condemn this paper's criticisms as contributions to proper development, and our mail brings daily commendation from all parts of the state.

The Argonaut has never pretended to know the exact reason for the resignation of Dr. Barrows. 'He has not yet announced it.' Certainly he would not have resigned so lofty a position, one fit in dignity for former Presidents of the nation, and in opportunity for the finest talents of mankind, and one whose spiritual compensations he himself has put above all money price—certainly he would not have resigned such a position had all been going well and to his liking. His eloquent silence since his courteous letter to the regents confirms our belief that it veiled the disappointment of a gentleman. Our interpretation of his act, from obvious material, may have caused him some embarrassment, but the question is a broader one than the feelings of any individual. A great state institution, the greatest institution we have except the penitentiary at the opposite social pole, has been permitted, in order to popularize itself, to degenerate toward—we do not say to, but toward—the clap-trap and gimcrack character of a cheap summer resort. The petting parties and jazzing spirit that occur in the undergraduate body are only the expression by that body of the general looseness and confusion of aim manifested by the elective system, co-education, broadcasted extension courses on any subject under the sun that might seem popular, political sail-trimming, snap courses leading to degrees that have largely lost their meaning, inflated attendance, and a general pie-à-la-mode attitude toward the curriculum and the funds; in short, what Professor Lewis calls "the general trend toward expansion and dissipation." Says this professor, "Few realize what a small portion of the university appropriations is devoted to the purpose of fundamental instruction." It is now announced that Miss Genevieve Kelso, who directed the Marion Morgan Dancers for two years, has been engaged by the University of California to give four courses during the summer session in Los Angeles. One of these courses, entitled "Social Dancing," is designed primarily for those interested in the improvement of conditions influencing the social life of high school and college students. Good form and style on the dance floor will be taught and also combinations of steps and figures suitable for any group dancing.

The physical education department has secured the services of Theodore Viehman of the drama department of Carnegie Institute of Technology. Viehman specializes in pageant organization and production. A festival of dance pantomime is to be chosen for production by the class and a pageant will be given in the university grounds. During the 1921 session a pageant was presented by the students and a production will be arranged this year on a more elaborate scale. Viehman will also direct two courses in English folk dancing.

Unless such courses are self-supporting, which is a violent supposition, many a toiling farmer in California, with a mortgage on his farm and a life-struggle on his horny hands, whose wife gets up at 4 in the morning to milk the cows and cook breakfast for the hired men, is helping pay for these dancing and posing lessons in addition to the interest he has to pay the bank. It is unfair competition, at the taxpayers' expense, with the Packard Sisters and other professional terpsichoreans. If students wish to devote their time to studies of the dance they should go to such artists as these, and let Dad know what he is paying out and what time they are sacrificing for that particular form of scholarship. And they need not refer to it as education, physical or otherwise, for that is not a proper designation for it. It is nothing but the froth and frosting of life, and has no proper place in the curriculum of a university. And those that do it know it. Dancing is but one item and example of the many items of excess weight. It represents much.

The Argonaut wants to see this struggle for popularity stopped. It wants to see that sinister principle depicted in Professor Gayley's book as the Man of Argos kicked out of faculty and Board of Regents: the principle that "money maketh a man." It wants to see a return to the basis of character training and sound scholarship, which it believes are at bottom one and the same thing in any properly conducted institution of learning. And it is encouraged to believe, from what it has learned of the soul-searching it has started among the students, that it will have at least the moral indorsement of some of the best and brightest of California's magnificent youth. And youth will help save the spirit of its own university, just as it helped save buildings and property at the fire that destroyed Hearst Hall last Tuesday night. It has vast influence with both regents and faculty. It will not waste its golden years when it sees what it is doing.

Cursing the Umpire.

Things in this country have come to a pretty pass. Here is Senator La Follette stealing William J. Bryan's stuff by attacking the Supreme Court. Mr. Bryan has had a monopoly of that sort of thunder and lightning since the great days of 1896, when he drew from a Democratic convention and its spectators a demonstration of the ease with which one with a strong voice could vault into high position by hurling bad names at the occupants of the Supreme Bench. It is true that since that time Mr. Bryan has but intermittently used his property. It is true that he made distant excursions into the field of government ownership of railroads, anti-imperialism, whatever that might mean, prohibition, morality, religion, saving the country from the predatory interests and Judson Harmon, and attending to a lot of other things he thought needed his attention, leaving the Supreme Bench to enjoy an authority it derived merely from the Constitution and from sticking to its duties; except for his diatribes against President Taft for appointing to it men Mr. Bryan stigmatized as conservatives. Nevertheless, and despite this neglect of his peculiar political property, the country recognized his claim thereto; but now it appears that it is to pass to Senator La Follette by appropriation and user.

The Wisconsin senator and protector of the dairying interests of his state against the corrupting (and cheapening) influences of oleomargarine, arises in the Cincinnati convention of the American Federation of Labor and proposes amendments to the Constitution which would give Congress a veto over Supreme Court decisions by reenactment of any law declared by the Supreme Court unconstitutional, and which would deny to the lower Federal courts any power to declare a law unconstitutional at all. He speaks of "judicial usurpation," which has a terrible sound and tends to make one feel that the foundations of the government have been undermined fatally—a Bryanesque sort of phrase which assumes the thing that wants proving and so forecloses debate, after the manner of a disputant with a poor cause. His rhetoric is less distinguished than Mr. Bryan's, for he says: "The time has come when we must put the axe to the root of this monstrous growth upon the body of our government"—a statement that seems to indicate some confusion as to whether the body of the government is in need of surgery or forestry. Yet we feel that unless Mr. Bryan is willing to return to the attack, Senator La Follette must be recognized as the champion of our liberties against "judicial usurpation."

About this question there is a good deal more confusion than appears in Senator La Follette's rhetoric. The Supreme Court is popularly supposed to nullify or veto laws enacted by Congress in its wisdom, and this supposition, which they know to be fallacious, is nourished and built up by gentlemen of rabble-raising talents for the political advantage they can make of it. The real principle is nothing of the sort. An unconstitutional statute is not law, and it never was law, and when the Supreme Court points out that fact it is not exercising any usurped power of veto over an act of Congress, nor "setting aside" something Congress has done. Congress can not pass a statute that is unconstitutional, because it has no power to do so. When it goes through the motions and makes the noises of passing a law that contravenes the Constitution, it has done nothing except make the aforesaid motions and noises. The Supreme Court does not veto it, because there is nothing to veto.

The Constitution carefully limits the power of Congress, and when Congress oversteps those limits, what it seeks to do was nullified, in most cases, before its members were born, and in any case before it acted. This whole question was threshed out to a rational conclusion in 1787 and before, and on that conclusion our national development is based. Without a limitation on the powers of the legislative branch of government, Congress would become more despotic than Nero.

On no other basis could we have operated the United States. The country was too big, its interests too diverse, its peoples too antagonistic in their needs and desires and sentiments. The Supreme Court is sometimes divided in opinion, but it is the only guardian of the Constitution, the only guardian of the rights of minorities against the voracity of majorities, and its defective functioning, which it must be conceded has more than once been apparent in our history, is inseparable from its human character—a character it will have to wear for a long time, because we can not seem to produce any supermen to serve on it. Of course, it has a dangerous power, inasmuch as it is the umpire. But there has to be an umpire in every ball game, and he must have the authority to enforce his decisions. He is not infallible, any more than the constitutional umpire of the country, the Supreme Court; but you couldn't have ball games without him, human and imperfect as he is known to be. It is better to run the risk of an occasional defective decision than to try to get along without umpires, or with decisions made by the spectators.

Baseball is a well-established institution in this country, and we have the habit of thinking about many things in terms of it. If the American League, or the National League, were to adopt a rule tomorrow providing that close plays should be referred for decision to the bleachers, the first game played under that rule would be the last played at all. Five minutes after game was called the field would be filled with battling men, ambulances would carry away the dead and crippled, and the police would have to prohibit any more such fatal gatherings. The battles of Blues and Whites in the hippodrome of Constantinople would be child's play to it. The whole country recognizes the necessity of having umpires, and while they are fallible human beings, and often make poor decisions, no sane person thinks of accusing them of setting up a "judicial oligarchy." That is left for Senator La Follette to say of the Supreme Court, and when he says it of the Supreme Court it is no more rational than if he had said it of the country's baseball umpires. In short, what Senator La Follette is doing is just throwing pop bottles at the umpire.

In declaring a law unconstitutional a court merely points out the nullity of congressional efforts when those efforts would overstep the bounds of what the nation has agreed shall be the fundamental law. Those limits are not lightly to be set aside for the interests of any class, however large, merely because it is a vigilant and an aggressive class, armed with the power of organization. If so, who will protect the rest of us against Congress itself? Who will protect Senator La Follette's amended Constitution?

If the senator dislikes the legal groundwork of the country so bitterly, he might try it awhile in Germany, which operates on a different plan, and where everybody is virtuous and happy. We do not say that he should stay there permanently—a brief rest is all the country needs. There would be many dry eyes at his departure.

Thoughts on the Irish Situation.

The latest reports from Ireland are that the pro-treaty men made a clean sweep at the elections last Friday in Dublin. Unfortunately for the formation of any adequate opinion of Irish affairs, it is as hard to get news out of Ireland as out of Russia. Perhaps harder, for the ambiguities in the case of Russia are largely due to internal inconsistencies. In the case of Ireland, add to internal disintegration external interests and affiliations and the result is such a hurly burly that it is doubtful if even history will resolve it into an explicable pattern. There is probably no solution to the Irish problem, or at least none that man—not even Lloyd George—can solve. But it is possible to understand why there is no solution. It is a country composed of such varied races as Brythonic Kelts and Scandinavian Teutons, races who, moreover, did not go to Ireland with the amicable intention of converting it into a melting pot. They have done so, but that is by the way. Each went with the warlike purpose of exterminating its predecessors. True, that was a long time ago. But the animosity has been kept alive. There may be something peculiar in the climate or geographical location of the verdant isle that conduces to static conditions. It is a particularly languorous, agreeable climate, and it is a noteworthy fact that the progressive nations are not those with summer-resort weather. But if Ireland is not progressive, neither is she decadent. She is merely conservative and inert. Hence, strangely enough, the perpetual strife.

Anthropological and geographical speculations aside, Ireland has the misfortune to be judged by her riffraff, who are the only part of that nation to assert themselves. The civil strife in Ireland is often referred to as a religious war. It is a country that has amazingly kept alive many mediaeval institutions, but it is doubtful if the fossil of one-and-only-one true religion motivates even an Irishman in hurling a brick through his neighbor's window or in operating a machine-gun through the streets of Dublin. All that is really clear here is that it is impossible to generalize on the cause of the Irish revolution. Bolshevism has played a large part; and Bolshevism, like early civilization, colonization, and all other invasions, seems to be going West.

The Tariff Becalmed.

As this publication predicted, the tariff bill is making very poor headway in the Senate, and probably will not emerge from that fane of wisdom until the leaves have turned yellow in the fall. One member plaintively remarked on a recent brow-mopping day, "We are going to be here all summer." It certainly looks as though they would. The barque is rolling listlessly on the glassy swells of the doldrums, and the crew looks over side with spell-bound eyes, wondering when they will ever make a landfall. The tariff is becalmed.

One trouble is, in addition to the fitfulness of the breeze or lack of any breeze at all, that the ship is not united. The bow wants to go ahead, the stern wants to back up. This puts the timbers amidships under a terrible stretch, and the officers are afraid the thing will part and founder. There is little danger with a craft so buoyant and, withal, so well fastened, but these conflicting desires do not hasten its progress, and would not now, even if favoring gales arose. The opposition is not entirely Democratic opposition. In fact, some of the Southern Democrats are high protectionists for Southern manufacturers. Many Republicans are cursed with doubts as to just how they should behave, and are receiving conflicting intimations as to what their constituents want. The bill carries higher duties than any ever proposed in this country, and at the same time many elements heretofore favorable to the highest forms of protection are now undecided and some have grown quite frankly hostile. This arises out of two diametrically opposed elements that happened to have coincided in time: one is the war, and the other is the farmer bloc, a new political element.

The farmer bloc in the Senate has been represented in the tariff matter largely by Senator Frank R. Gooding of Idaho, who is known in Western parlance as a "sheep man." He had one resolute and determined purpose in the tariff business and that was a high duty on wool, a duty if possible exceeding those heretofore demanded by the woolen Republicans of Ohio. In order to get such rates into the bill, Gooding was willing to have the schedules on all other farm products hoisted to the head of the derrick, and a year or so ago, when things were in their formative stages, the whole farm bloc was with him. It looked at that time as though the farmers were threatened with foreign competition and they wanted some compensation for having had to stand a maximum wheat price during the war. So the farm fences were built very high. And then, because they were, the manufacturers had to have equally high fences, and so the whole thing grew like a giant's child.

Now the fear of foreign competition once obsessing the farmers has proved to be what sundry calm persons at the time said it was, merely one of the innumerable transient vicissitudes of agriculture. It has passed. The Western farmers, the grain and meat farmers, are again what they regularly are in this country, an exporting class, and most of them can derive no benefit from many of the highest of the agricultural schedules; but to keep up with what they thought they wanted, the rates on manufactures were made extremely high, and the farmers are beginning to see that they will have to pay them on what manufactured articles they use, generally speaking, and get no compensation on their own products. The whole bill is so high as to invite attack, and the invitation has been enthusiastically accepted by the organizations that made it so: the American Farm Bureau Federation and the Farmers' National Union. The only farmers left to support what the farm bloc did are the political farmers.

But the disturbance of agricultural values by the war was only part of the larger financial disturbance. When the war made us the creditor nation of the world it caused a financial revolution. The debts owing our government by foreign governments are estimated at about $11,000,000,000, or about $2,500,000,000 more gold than there is in the world; and the private debts owed by European business firms to American firms are said to be anywhere between one and four billions more. These debts can not be paid in money; there isn't enough. The Transvaal and Klondike couldn't do it. They have to be paid in goods. And the bankers know it and are beginning to ask how it can be done if we won't let the goods enter. Thus a visible change is coming over the attitude of certain elements once friendly to a high protective tariff. And we believe this is a new alignment on the subject. It is evident in the publications of many banks and bond houses. Strassburger's Review in this city says about the pending tariff bill: "The worst house built has some redeeming features. We have tried to find them in this crazy house. We admit failure." The monthly letter of the National City Bank of New York says:

The upward revision of the tariff which is in process in Congress is causing no small amount of confusion and anxiety in business circles, and increases the complexity of our international relations. Every change, although made for the purpose of benefiting some American industry, has effects reaching beyond that industry, and often far beyond what have been foreseen. It is not necessary in questioning the wisdom of disrupting trade relations still farther at this time, to enter into an argument over the achievements of the protective policy in the past. There are many people who believe it has rendered great service in diversifying and developing our industries, but who recognize that the questions of today are not the same as the questions of the past.

These are just a few straws indicating that when the breeze freshens it may be blowing from an entirely new quarter, and the officers and crew of the tariff barque may be quite willing to steer it into some strange harbor rather than none. Business wants the thing settled. There is much confusion in the Senate as to just how to settle it, and the Senate does not get much help from business itself. If a general change in sentiment about the tariff is really taking place in this country, as some things seem to indicate, the party managers may in time be very grateful for the present delay.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Return to Solid Values.

EUREKA, June 12, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: As a taxpayer and former student at the State University I desire to congratulate you upon a large portion of your editorial of May 27th—more particularly that portion in which you dwell upon the development of the university away from its proper lines. I know nothing of the relations between the president and the regents and academic senate, but for a number of years it has seemed to many of the old-time students that the institution has become a species of huge department store of various forms of teaching, much of it cheap and poor, but glaringly advertised, and that the old dignity and solidity and value upon which we formerly prided ourselves have been exchanged for things ephemeral and of little worth.

I personally agree with you to the last word in regard to the failure of coeducation at the university, and to the desirability of giving the women a separate college, so that it may become a real university, great in actuality, instead of a strange monstrosity—"the greatest matrimonial agency in the world."

For a Better University.

BERKELEY, June 14, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The Mothers' Committee for Better Citizenship, Berkeley Chapter of the American Red Cross, wishes to express its appreciation of the Argonaut's constructive criticism of the University of California.

Very truly yours, MARIE B. SNOOK,
Chairman of the Mothers' Committee for Better Citizenship.
Per HARRIET BATES CALKINS, Secretary.

Money, in the form of metallic coins, probably superseded all other legal tenders. The first record of the coining of silver was in 869 B. C., and it was made in Rome as early as 269 B. C., and in Great Britain twenty-five years before the Christian Era. Gold was first coined in England in 1087. Copper money was introduced by James I of England in 1620. The United States mint began to coin money in 1793.

The new thing is often the old thing refound. Even the political equality of the sexes was anticipated centuries ago. It has just been discovered that in the year 2400 B. C. a city in Asia Minor was ruled by a prince and princess with male and female prefect, and that the women had precisely the same power as their colleagues.

The contingent furnished by New York City to the Union army in the civil war has dwindled to 826 men.

MR. BELLOC AND THE JEWS.

On first seeing Hilaire Belloc, one is surprised to find that he looks very much as might have been expected, if this statement is intelligible to any one save an Irishman. One is surprised, because writers seldom resemble their books, or prove to be what one would infer from their writings. The authors' likenesses broadcasted nowadays by the publishers have destroyed many of the illusions that used to be possible on this score, and have driven us reluctantly to conclude that authors are a class of gifted liars, who find it advisable to allow great gulfs to yawn between what they write and what they are. But Belloc is one of the notable exceptions.

I saw him first in a debate. This was not a rare opportunity, as in those days he was continually traveling to joust with some debater or other in this or that town in the United Kingdom on subjects connected with Socialism, Jewry, or Catholicism. He looked like a man who had served in the French army. He also looked like a scholar deeply versed in the civilization of the Romans, and who had traveled their roads on foot across Europe to Rome. He had the air of a humanist and a Catholic. He had the general features of a man well acquainted with inns, weathered in the winds of mountain summits and the sea, and mellowed and matured in the sunny valleys of Western Europe. In short, he looked like the man who had written of all these things, and he was that man, capping it all with something of the burly, self-respecting look of an English country squire.

As a debater I thought him the most resourceful and convincing speaker in Great Britain, not excepting Bernard Shaw, who has a greater gift of satire, but less firmness and assurance in deploying a shattered phalanx of evidence. The secret of Belloc's power in this regard is, I think, his entire sincerity, his good-humored earnestness, the fact that he would rather convince than dazzle his audience, and that his philosophy is an organic growth rather than a mere logical structure which the facts have been shaped to fit. Shaw gives an impression of having rifled history and literature here and there for bright verifications of a startling theme; with Belloc the ideas seem to have had a deeper and more natural inception.

My first meeting with him was in a Scottish university where he had been invited by the college Liberals to announce the candidature of Augustine Birrell for the lord rectorship. Several of us had luncheon with him before he delivered his speech. I seem to remember that Mr. Belloc drank six bottles of Bass' ale and a bottle of port, and that we were all very highly pleased. It may have been the simple pleasure of youth in unapologetic excess, or admiration of robustness in middle age, but I think the gesture was appreciated chiefly as a symptom of literary integrity. The hypocrisy of authors had brought disillusion to many of our young intelligences, and it was refreshing to know that when Mr. Belloc defended wine in such books as the "Path to Rome" or his essays on English inns he did so from profound and practical conviction as well as from the usual romantic, liturgical, and decorative motives.

The same quality of "forthrightness" was apparent in the speech he delivered after this remarkable refreshment. It was a solid exposition of the inside bargaining that characterizes the party system in every democracy, a theme to which his tribute to Birrell was merely a courteous preliminary.

The commanding trait of this extraordinary man, as of his more widely known associate and protégé, Gilbert Chesterton, is that he says what he means, and that one can pick up his creed at any point and find it coherent throughout. The key to his general belief fits all the individual doors, and he makes no mystery about the key. I am not holding a brief for the creed of Mr. Belloc and Mr. Chesterton. I only mean that the explanation of their enormous influence on contemporary thought is the fact that their belief is a coherent one, that the general and particular phases of it form a consistent unit, and that they show no equivocation in stating it.

This, I believe, goes far toward explaining the high estimation in which they were held in the Scottish universities, where the genius loci could hardly have been called favorable to the idea they represented, the northern seats of learning in the decade before the war being about equally divided between emphatic atheism and a political or devout attachment to the Presbyterian tradition. The enthusiasm for Belloc and Chesterton was really a tribute to the evident consistency between their belief and practice. This is an equation on which the Scots have always put particular stress. Further, both were splendid logicians, and Belloc had by heredity the French gift of lucidity in analysis on which the Scots set such high value.

As an American, I was greatly interested by his picture of Great Britain as an integral part of the European continent, and his contention that the common association of the nations of Western Europe under the Roman Empire and the Catholic Church had been too profound and its effect too enduring to be affected by two or three centuries of quasi isolation.

Consistently with that perspective, Belloc was one of the first to take up the problem of the Jew in Great Britain, long before many of his compatriots were willing to regard it as anything more than a continental question, governed by special causes with which Britain had no concern.

When the weekly paper founded in London by Mr. Belloc and the Chesterton brothers began its attack on Jewish influence in the British cabinet, and incurred the famous libel suit on that issue, many of us felt that they had been betrayed into a mistaken position. Since that time the problem has taken on a clearer outline. The Bolshevik revolution in Russia, directed by Jewish leaders against a government hostile to the Jews, has had as profound an effect on England as on any other country, and has carried many people who previously ridiculed the existence of a Jewish problem in England into the violent and irrational reaction called "Anti Semitism."

It is a fortunate circumstance, as well as one of those ironies of which the history of such controversies is full, that the man whose opposition to Jews had been almost unique in its frankness should now appear as an advocate of humanity and equity in the adjustment of the Jew's status in the crisis of instability the world is now facing.

In his recent book, "The Jews," Mr. Belloc derides the very name of "Anti Semitism" as irrational, since it implies antagonism to Arabians, Egyptians, and all the other branches of the Semitic family, and he condemns the reaction as unjust and unchristian. The Jewish problem as he sees it is fundamentally, although indirectly, a religious one. The Jewish religion has produced in its followers a viewpoint alien to that of the Christian nations among whom they have settled. This difference, while not apparently important in itself, causes a gradual rift which the Jews attempt to conceal with a number of expedients not well adapted to that purpose. The divergence is at first ignored by their "hosts," then recognized and tolerated, but resented. As time goes on the resentment shows itself with increasing vehemence till it breaks out in active antagonism. Pursuing this invariable cycle throughout history, the Jews have migrated from one section of the world to another, welcomed at first, but incurring increasing opposition as the friction caused by their activities become more acute, and finally being driven to fresh emigration. Belloc traces the cause of all this, not to any inferiority of character in the Jew, but to the peculiarity of his position and to the strategy he instinctively employs for greater security. While the Jews as a race have been accused of avarice, inordinate thirst for power, and other such faults, he regards these traits as by no means inherent in the Jewish character. Their minds, it is true, are characterized by what seems to us an uncanny singleness of purpose; they concentrate with remarkable intensity on whatever they make their aim, whether it be money, or art, or social service, or philanthropy, or what not. This in itself is a radical point of dissimilarity from the Christian peoples, who do things in a broader, more careless way.

But the main cause of conflict is that, in their desire for greater security, the Jews instinctively resort to expedients that are uncongenial to the Christian idea and that give them a power far greater than their numbers or their deserts. Their tendency toward monopoly in industry, to the veiled permeation and financial control of government, to domination of the press and the theatre and hence of propagandist instruments with which they can "boom" their own interests, and to political solidarity, all represent their mistaken means of stabilizing their status among alien and therefore potentially hostile races. This desire, coupled with their natural concentrative bent, pushes them to extremes that produce in time an inevitable reaction against them.

The existence of the problem is denied by many. It is denied, of course, by the Jews themselves, who encourage every belief that serves to obscure it. The most common form of the denial is the claim that differences are disappearing through absorption, and that religion is a waning factor in the affairs of nations and races. The latter contention has a certain appearance of truth as regards the formality and ritual of religion, but not as regards its inward operation in determining the manners, viewpoint, habits, modes of thought, tradition, humors and ideals of a people who inherit its effects through many centuries of custom and discipline. As to the absorption, Belloc denies that it has been active enough to affect the problem. Plastic as the Jew's defensive instinct have taught him to be with respect to externals, he is fundamentally the most un-malleable type in the world. He refuses to solve the problem by adopting the Christian tradition. He remains as distinct as he has ever been; indeed he is at present rather more contemptuously so than ever before. It is to be remembered that all this allows of wide exception. As Belloc puts it, no race shows so wide a divergence between its individual and general action, and yet there is none in which that general action is so constant and predictable.

Ultimately the general policy of the Jews, while highly intelligible and not exactly discreditable (at least it is what any other race so situated would follow), culminates in the reverse of its intention. For when Jews are disclosed in control of this or that enormous monopoly, affecting the lives and peaceful relationship of Christian nations, when powerful names and influences purporting not to be Jewish are found actually to be so; when internal and international trouble is caused by their activity, a violent anti-Jewish reaction almost surely follows. And the reaction is preposterously out of proportion to its cause. When the anonymous and concealed activities to which certain Jews have been prompted by fear become generally known, their hosts exaggerate the reality and are filled with a disproportionate sense of helplessness and nameless peril. The invisible is always exaggerated. And the violence of the reaction surprises no one more than the victims themselves, who find themselves accused of having done as disciplined and deliberate conspirators what they have done merely through a kind of half-conscious motive of self-protection.

In one of his final chapters Belloc points to the anti-Jewish movement in America as a final token of the unassimilability of the Jew under the most favorable conditions and of the impracticality of present methods of approaching the problem. Since his book was issued, a few months ago, there have been various developments that throw an interesting light on his argument, the Ku Klux fantasia among them.

He sees the remedy in frank recognition by "guests and hosts" alike of the Jew's distinctive character and religion; open acknowledgment of his nationality by the Jew; discontinuance of the unwise expedients he has hitherto adopted to make his position more secure; open discussion by both sides regarding the factors that have heretofore caused friction between them, and definition of the Jew as a separate part of the nation in which he finds himself. This recognition should be a matter of social and intellectual habit to begin with, rather than of legal demarcation, as the latter would at present entail great injustice. On the other hand, insistence by the Jew on the right of double allegiance, i. e., on his right to a double nationality, will inevitably precipitate such legislation. Belloc's Spartan solution is that since the Jew can not be an Irishman, Englishman, Frenchman, American and so on, except in a nominal sense, he should be accepted simply and exclusively as a Jew. The author points to the imposition of the Jew by American and English influence on Poland and Roumania as a mistake that will cause the gravest consequences. It has, he claims, produced a condition that is impossible of continuance because it is unreal, the Jew being regarded by the true Pole or Roumanian as unalterably an alien.

He maintains that separate nationalism for the Jew is the only alternative to such brutal measures as pogroms, with their hideous policy of extermination, to the cruel expedient of deportation, which implies perpetual exile, and to the other perils that are imposed on Jew and Christian alike by the anomalous and contradictory position the former now occupies.

Mr. Belloc's argument rests, of course, on a basis with which many critics disagree. He is a Catholic, and his view of the Jewish problem, as of every other, is consistent with that fact. It is his belief that the problems of the modern world are those of antiquity, that the instruments of modern culture have done nothing to make the absorption of the Jew more possible than of old, and that the ingredients of the "melting pot" are soluble only when differences of race have already been softened by centuries of fusion under a common creed.

This may or may not be true, but it is at least intelligible and clear, and stated with a candor and courtesy that can offend no one who approaches the question honestly. Certainly one can hardly differ with him regarding the necessity for frankness in discussing it.

AUBREY BOYD.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 21, 1922.

The French Academy was founded by Cardinal Richelieu in 1635. It has a membership of forty, known as the "Forty Immortals," and its principal object was to prepare a dictionary of the French language and to keep the Gallic tongue pure and capable of treating the arts and sciences. The first dictionary appeared in 1694. The Academy has been very severely criticized, especially in the selection of its members, many well-known men of letters having failed to be elected.

Apropos of Lady Rhondra's claim to sit in the House of Lords, it is interesting to recall the fact that in the reign of Edward I the Abbess of Shaftesbury, the Abbess of Barking, the Abbess of St. Mary of Winchester, and the Abbess of Wilton were summoned to Parliament, as were, in the reign of Edward III, the Countess of Norfolk, the Countess of Ormonde, the Countess of Pembroke, and the Countess of Oxford.

Philadelphia is preparing to hold a sesqui-centennial celebration in 1926, in the form of an international exposition. The word "sesqui" is Latin for one and a half.

In the decade from 1860 to 1870 the population of the country increased from 31,443,321 to 38,558,371.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Thomas Lynch, who enlisted in the United States Navy when the personnel was but 8000, has recently completed forty years' continuous service.

Thomas A. Edison, now in his seventy-fifth year, was recently given the honorary degree of Doctor of Science by Rutgers College.

Lily Elsie, England's most beautiful actress of a decade ago, who retired from the stage on her marriage to Ian Bullough, will reappear at Daly's, London, for the benefit of the deaf and dumb of the British capital.

Sir James Pennell Redd, former British ambassador to Italy, has been appointed principal English delegate on the commission to confer on modifications and additions to the laws of war, as provided by the Washington Disarmament Conference. Sir James was a visitor to this country in 1908.

The minister from Czechoslovakia, M. Stepanekovna, is both a practical musician and a composer. He and his sister render their national music on several instruments. The minister, who is greatly interested in economics and sociology, has been sending large consignments of books to the grade schools of Prague and other Bohemian cities.

Claude Raquet Hirst, the painter, is said to be unexcelled in her particular métier—that of painting old books and pipes. Many years ago Miss Hirst lent her studio to W. C. Fittler, the landscape artist, who left the studio cluttered with pipes and books. Miss Hirst was inspired to paint a group of the untidy landscapist's belongings, which sold immediately. Since the sale of that picture Miss Hirst has painted nothing but old books and pipes, and always on an eight-by-ten-inch canvas. Because of the detail in her work she has been called the female Harnett. Two years after the sale of her first meerschaum-book still life Miss Hirst married the owner of the pipe.

Major Ora M. Baldinger, who has been made personal military aide to President Harding, was one of the group of "newsies" whom Mrs. Harding trained when she was circulation manager of her husband's paper. As a youngster of ten the new aide was promoted to the inside office and served the editor of the Marion Star as confidential messenger. When Mr. Harding entered politics he took young Baldinger to Columbus, where he was appointed a page in the Ohio senate. Later he took a course at the Virginia Military Institute and eventually entered the army, receiving his commission in 1912. Major Baldinger was an instructor in aviation when he became an aide in the White House.

Thomas Hardy, whose eighty-second birthday was celebrated on June 2d, still lives at the place of his birth—Dorsetshire. He is reported to be in good health and it is certain that he is at the zenith of his popularity, for publishers' statistics show an ever-increasing demand for his book. Mr. Hardy is of peasant origin, but never had to battle with the difficulties that usually beset the path of poor genius. His talents were early discovered and he was given an excellent education. Strangely enough, it was not in literature that he first distinguished himself. He studied architecture from the age of sixteen to twenty-seven and was prizeman of the Royal Institute of British Architects in 1863. He began to write verse at the age of twenty, but gave up verse for prose in 1868. Later he resumed his poetic studies. Mr. Hardy won the rare British honor of the Order of Merit in 1910. He has been married twice.

E. M. Statler, owner of one of the largest of American chains of hotels, began his industrial career at the age of nine in a glass factory, where his duty was to tend the "glory hole," a furnace similar to the kilns in pottery works. There the young Statler earned 50 cents to 90 cents a day over a period of three years and helped support the eight other members of his family. At the age of twelve he became a bellboy at the McClure House in Wheeling, where he received his first instructions in English grammar from a bartender employed there. From being bellboy his rise was steady until he became a night clerk and then a day clerk at $50 a month. On this munificent pay Statler had contrived to save enough money to lease the billiard room of the hotel and the railroad ticket concession. About fifteen years after he had quit the "glory hole" he was making between $4000 and $5000 a year. Today the Statler Hotel is a familiar institution in Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, St. Louis and New York; and Boston is soon to have a hotel built on the principles of "a bath with every room" and "a guest is never wrong."

A. Maurice Low, upon whom a knighthood has been conferred by King George in connection with the distribution of the king's birthday honors, is a resident of Washington, D. C., where he has been stationed for many years as a newspaper correspondent. He is now the principal American representative of the London Morning Post and contributes frequently to British and American magazines. Sir Maurice Low was born in London in 1860, was educated at King's College, London, and in Austria, and came to the United States more than thirty years ago. For a time he was connected with the Washington Post and subsequently was the Washington correspondent of the Boston Globe. In the Spanish war he was a newspaper correspondent in Cuba. He is a chevalier of the Belgian Order of Leopold. Sir Maurice Low has written a novel, "The Supreme Surrender," and is the author also of "Protection in the United States," "A Short History of Labor Legislation in Great Britain," and several other political and economical studies. In 1900 he went to England for the United States Department of Labor to investigate certain phases of English labor legislation. He is a member of the American Academy of Political and Social Science and the American Social Science Association.

Dolly Varden.

Dear Dolly! who does not recall
The thrilling page that pictured all
Those charms that held our sense in thrall,
Just as the artist caught her—
As down the English lane she tripped,
In bowered chintz, hat sideways tipped,
Trim-bodied, bright-eyed, roguish-lipped,
The locksmith's pretty daughter.

Sweet fragment of the Master's art!
O simple faith! O rustic heart!
O maid that hath no counterpart
In life's dry, dog-eared pages!
Where shall we find thy like? Ah, stay!
Methinks I saw her yesterday
In chintz that flowered, as one might say,
Perennial for ages.

Her father's modest cot was stone,
Five stories high; in style and tone
Composite, and, I frankly own,
Within its walls revealing
Some certain novel, strange ideas;
A Gothic door with Roman piers,
And floors removed some thousand years
From their Pompeian ceiling.

The small salon where she received
Was Louis Quatorze, and relieved
By Chinese cabinets, conceived
Grotesquely by the heathen;
The sofas were a classic sight—
The Roman bench (sedilia hight);
The chairs were French in gold and white,
And one Elizabethan.

And she, the goddess of that shrine,
Two ringed fingers placed in mine—
The stones were many carats fine,
And of the purest water—
Then dropped a curtsy, far enough
To fairly fill her cretonne puff
And show the petticoat's rich stuff
That her fond parent bought her.

Her speech was simple as her dress—
Not French the more, but English less,
She loved; yet sometimes, I confess,
I scarce could comprehend her.
Her manners were quite far from shy:
There was a quiet in her eye
Appalling to the Hugh who'd try
With rudeness to offend her.

"But whence," I cried, "this masquerade?
Some figure for this night's charade—
A Watteau shepherdess or maid?"
She smiled and begged my pardon:
Why surely you must know the name—
That woman who was Shakespeare's flame
Or Byron's—well, it's all the same:
"Why, Lord! I'm Dolly Varden!"

Without and Within.

My coachman, in the moonlight there,
Looks through the side-light of the door;
I hear him with his brethren swear,
As I could do,—only but more.

Flattening his nose against the pane,
He envies me his brilliant lot,
Breathes on his aching fists in vain,
And dooms me to a place more hot.

He sees me in to supper go,
A silken wonder by my side,
Bare arms, bare shoulders, and a row
Of flounces, for the door too wide.

He thinks how happy is my arm
'Neath its white-gloved and jeweled load;
And wishes me some dreadful harm,
Hearing the merry corks explode.

Meanwhile I inly curse the bore
Of hunting still the same old coon,
And envy him, outside the door,
In golden quiet of the moon.

The winter wind is not so cold
As the bright smile he sees me win,
Nor the host's oldest wine so old
As our poor gabble sour and thin.

I envy him the unguvied prance
With which his freezing feet he warms,
And drag my lady's chains and dance
The galley-slave of dreary forms.

Oh, could he have my share of din,
And I his quiet!—past a doubt
'T would still be one man bored within,
And just another bored without.

Nay, when, once paid my mortal fee,
Some idler on my headstone grim Traces the moss-blurred name, will he Think me the happier, or I him?

SICILY TO SARDINIA.

D. H. Lawrence Contributes Some Fascinating Sketches of Mediterranean Life and Sea Travel.

A figure to be reckoned with in the world of books is D. H. Lawrence. He has been classified, by some of those who must classify or perish, as a "feminist," a term of uncertain significance, but which seems to imply that the wearer of it is interested mainly in women, or the feminine movement, or feminine fads, while the balance of us are masculinists, with no more interest in women than the monks of Mount Athos. The truth appears to be that Mr. Lawrence is just as much interested in men as he is in women, and that the masculinists among us are at least as much interested in women as in men, and sometimes more so, and so the classification itself falls into the class of hollow forms that are kept about the purlieus of Greenwich Village like floats for a parade, and meaning little else. But if some of his verses reek of sex, his recent prose publication, "Sea and Sardinia," discloses him as a humanist in at least one sense of the term, and as a naturalist almost as much, although not quite.

Here is a delightful travel book, full of strange taverns and road adventures, and people—always people. The author appears to love nature not so much for itself as for the setting it has given humanity. And no writer of the moment seems to see humanity closer or more vividly or in more interesting aspects. It reminds one of Borrow more than a little, although Lawrence finds his gypsies in characters less vagrant. But his pages are filled with them, and with fascinating experiences among inn-keepers, stage-drivers, sailors and primitive Italians stranded in the island south of Corsica. To this island our author voyages from Palermo, after giving us this composite and highly stylistic portrait of some representative Sicilians:

They are mostly young fellows, going up the line to Messina to their job: not artisans, lower middle class. And externally, so like many any other clerks and shopkeepers, only rather more shabby, much less socially self-conscious. They are lively, they throw their arms round one another's necks, they all but kiss. One poor chap has had earache, so a black kerchief is tied round his face, and his black hat is perched above, and a comic sight he looks. No one seems to think so, however. Yet they view my arrival with a knapsack on my back with cold disapprobation, as unseemly as if I had arrived riding on a pig. I ought to be in a carriage, and the knapsack ought to be a new suitcase. I know it, but am inflexible.

That is how they are. Each one thinks he is as handsome as Adonis, and as "fetching" as Don Juan. Extraordinary! At the same time, all flesh is grass, and if a few trouser-buttons are missing or if a black hat perches above a thick black face-muffle and a long excruciated face, it is all in the course of nature. They seize the black-edged one by the arm, and in profound commiseration: "Do you suffer? Are you suffering?" they ask.

And that also is how they are. So terribly physically all over one another. They pour themselves one over the other like so much melted butter over parsnips. They catch each other under the chin, with a tender caress of the hand, and they smile with sunny melting tenderness into each other's face. Never in the world have I seen such melting gay tenderness as between casual Sicilians on railway platforms, whether they be young lean-cheeked Sicilians or huge stout Sicilians.

There must be something curious about the proximity of a volcano. Naples and Catania alike, the men are hugely fat, with great macaroni paunches, they are expansive and in a perfect drip of casual affection and love. But the Sicilians are even more wildly exuberant and fat and all over one another than the Neapolitans. They never leave off being amorously friendly with almost everybody, emitting relentless physical familiarity that is quite bewildering to one not brought up near a volcano.

This is more true of the middle classes than of the lower. The working men are perforce tanner and less exuberant. But they hang together in clusters, and can never be physically near enough.

Bucketing about the Mediterranean in little Italian vessels is a thing one likes if one likes that sort of thing, but authors of travel books have been forced into the most out-of-the-way places in order to avoid the overdone in-the-way places, and put themselves in the path of strange vicissitudes to give their readers good reading. Transit from Sicily to Sardinia was a mucky job, in a "long, slender, old steamer, with one funnel" and a crew that stood about like loafers on a street corner, consenting to be carried and fed, but apparently doing little else. What was the coal for?

Various members of the crew wander past to look at us. This little promenade deck is over the first-class quarters, full in the stern. So we see first one head then another come up the ladder—mostly bare heads: and one figure after another slouches past, smoking a cigarette. All crew. At last the queen bee stops one of them—it is what they are, waiting for, an opportunity to talk—and asks if the weird object on the top of Pellegrino is a ruin. Could there be a more touristy question! No, it is the semaphore station. Slap in the eye for the q-b! She doesn't mind, however, and a member of the crew proceeds to converse. He is a weedy, hollow-cheeked town-product: a Palermitan. He wears faded blue overalls and informs us he is the ship's carpenter: happily unemployed for the rest of his life, apparently, and taking it as rather less than his dues. The ship once did the Naples-Palermo course—a very important course—in the old days of the General Navigation Company. The General Navigation Company sold her for eighty thousand liras years ago, and now she is worth two million. We pretend to believe: but I make a poor show. I am thoroughly sick to death of the sound of liras. No man can overhear ten words of Italian today without two thousand or two million or ten or twenty or two liras flying like venomous mosquitoes round his ears. Liras—liras—liras—nothing else. Romantic, poetic, cypress-and-orange-tree Italy is gone. Remains an Italy smothered in the filthy smother of innumerable Lira notes: ragged, unsavory paper money so thick upon the air that one breathes it like some greasy fog. Behind this greasy fog some people may still see the Italian sun. I find it hard work. Through this murk of Liras you peer at Michael Angelo and at Botticelli and the rest, and see them all as through a glass, darkly. For heavy around you is Italy's after-the-war atmosphere, darkly pressing you, squeezing you, milling you into dirty paper notes. King Harry was lucky that they only wanted to coin him into gold. Italy wants to mill you into filthy paper Liras.

There was a stop of the greasy little steamer at Trapani; Trapani of the Crusaders, and hence of traditional interest and by rights some romantic charm. But here is a realistic sketch of Trapani today, and perhaps if we only knew it, the place has changed but little since the Crusaders stopped there on their way to the East and the Holy Land, so long ago:

We looked at the cakes—heavy and wan they appeared to our sea-rolled stomachs. So we strolled into a main street, dark and dank like a sewer. A tram bumped to a standstill as if now at last was the end of the world. Children coming from school ecstatically ran at our heels, with bated breath, to hear the vocal horrors of our foreign speech. We turned down a dark side alley, about forty paces deep: and were on the northern bay, and on a black stench that seemed like the perpetual sewer, a bank of mud.

So we got to the end of the black main street, and turned in haste to the sun. Ah—in a moment we were in it. There rose the palms, there lay our ship in the shining, curving basin—and there focused the sun, so that in a moment we were drunk or dazed by it. Dazed. We sat on an iron seat in the rubbish-desolate, sun-stricken avenue.

A ragged and dirty girl was nursing a fat and moist and immovable baby and tending to a grimy fat infant boy. She stood a yard away and gazed at us as one would gaze at a pig one was going to buy. She came nearer, and examined the q-b. I had my big hat down over my eyes. But no, she had taken her seat at my side, and poked her face right under my hat brim, so that her towzled hair touched me, and I thought she would kiss me. But again no. With her breath on my cheek she only gazed on my face as if it were a wax mystery. I got up hastily.

"Too much for me," said I to the q-b.

She laughed, and asked what the baby was called. The baby was called Beppina, as most babies are.

Driven forth, we wandered down the desolate avenue of shade and sun towards the ship, and turned once more into the town. We had not been on shore more than ten minutes. This time we went to the right, and found more shops. The streets were dark and sunless and cold. And Trapani seemed to me to sell only two commodities: cured rabbit skins and cat-skins, and great, hideous, modern bedspread arrangements of heavy flowered silk and fabulous price. They seem to think nothing of thousands of liras, in Trapani.

Changes wrought in people by the vast disturbance and misinterpreted phenomena of the war appear in this outlandish place, and serve to show how very general are the weaknesses of humanity. The luxury of insulting people is one that in Italy has almost been raised to the dignity of an art, but it seems to have derived fresh license from the sickness of the world. A traveler may well utter such complaint as this:

Cakes one dared not buy, after looking at them. But we found macaroon biscuits, and a sort of flat plaster-casts of the Infant Jesus under a dove, of which we bought two. The q-b ate her macaroon biscuits all through the streets, and we went towards the ship. The fat boatman hailed us to take us back. It was just about eight yards of water to row, the ship being moored on the quay: one could have jumped it. I gave the fat boatman, two liras, two francs. He immediately put on the socialist-workman indignation, and thrust the note back at me. Sixty centimes more! The fee was thirteen sous each way! In Venice or Syracuse it would be two sous. I looked at him and gave him the money and said: "Per Dio, we are in Trapani!" He muttered back something about foreigners. But the hateful, unmanly insolence of these lords of toil, now they have their various "unions" behind them and their "rights" as working men, sends my blood black. They are ordinary men no more: the human, happy Italian is most marvelously vanished. New honors come upon them, etc. The dignity of human labor is on its hind legs, busily giving every poor innocent who isn't ready for it a kick in the mouth.

But, once more in parenthesis, let me remind myself that it is our own English fault. We have slobbered about the nobility of toil, till at last the nobles naturally insist on eating the cake. And more than that, we have set forth, politically, on such a high and Galahad quest of holy liberty, and been caught so shamelessly filling our pockets, that no wonder the naïve and idealistic south turns us down with a bang.

However, after enough and perhaps more than enough of the sea, our travelers reached the enchanted island for which they had set out, there to encounter small adventure sufficient to fill a cyclopaedia of unimportant information, among which are recurrent contacts with interesting specimens of the human breed. It is like visiting the Zoo and seeing the animals fed—all the various species with their various ways and habits of ingestion. Here is a sample, from the town of Mandas:

And they fell on their soup. And never, from among the steam, have I heard a more joyful trio of soup-swilking. They sucked it from their spoons with long, gusto-rich sucks. The maialino was the treble—he trilled his soup into his mouth with a swift, sucking vibration, interrupted by bits of cabbage, which made the lamp start to dither again. Blackcap was the baritone; good, rolling spoon-sucks. And the one in spectacles was the bass: he gave sudden deep gulps. All was led by the long trilling of the maialino. I had suddenly, to vary matters, he cocked up his spoon in one hand, chewed a mouthful of bread and swallowed it down with a smack-smack-smack! of his tongue against his palate. As children we used to call this "clapping."

"Mother, she's clapping!" I would yell with anger, against my sister. The German word is schmatzen.

So the maialino clapped like a pair of cymbals, while baritone and the bass rolled on. Then in chimed the swift bright treble.

At this rate, however, the soup did not last long. Arrived the beefsteaks of pork. And now the trio was a trio of castanet smacks and cymbal claps. Triumphant the maialino looked around. He out-smacked all.

And here is a line of thought to which one may be driven by such horrors:

The workman's International movement will finally break the flow towards cosmopolitanism and world-assimilation, and suddenly in a crash the world will fly back into intense separations. The moment has come when America, that extremist in world-assimilation and world-oneness, is reacting into violent egocentricity, a truly Amerindian egocentricity. As sure as fate we are on the brink of an American empire.

For myself, I am glad. I am glad that the era of love and oneness is over: hateful homogeneous world-oneness. I am glad that Russia flies back into savage Russianism, Scythism, savagely self-pivoting. I am glad that America is doing the same. I shall be glad when men hate their common, world-alike clothes, when they tear them up and clothe themselves fiercely for distinction, savage distinction, savage distinction against the rest of the creeping world: when America kicks the billy-cock and the collar-and-tie into limbo, and takes to her own national costume: when men fiercely react against looking all alike and being all alike, and betake themselves into vivid clan or nation-distinctions.

The era of love and oneness is over. The era of world-alike should be at an end. The other tide has set in. Men will set their bonnets at one another now, and fight themselves into separation and sharp distinction. The day of peace and oneness is over, the day of the great fight into multifariousness is at hand. Hasten the day, and save us from proletarian homogeneity and khaki all-alikeness.

I love my indomitable coarse men from mountain Sardinia, for their stocking-caps and their splendid, animal-bright stupidity. If only the last wave of all-alikeness won't wash those superb crests, those caps, away.

Sorgono is a beautiful place in the sun, with one inn, and that so refreshingly bad that it is almost worth a chapter in itself. One of the best things about travel books is that you don't have to suffer while reading them what the author suffered while writing them. Vicarious sufferings are pleasant, which may explain human sacrifice. In this case everything appears to have been suffered that can be, and some things seen that elsewhere can not be, and perhaps this particular picture is one:

In dithers a candle, and an elderly, bearded man in gold-colored corduroys, and an amazing object on a long, long spear. He put the candle on the mantel-ledge, and crouched at the side of the fire, arranging the oak-roots. He peered strangely and fixedly in the fire. And he held up the speared object before our faces.

It was a kid that he had come to roast. But it was a kid opened out, made quite flat, and speared like a flat fan on a long iron stalk. It was a really curious sight. And it must have taken some doing. The whole of the skinned kid was there, the head curled in against a shoulder, the stubby cut ears, the eyes, the teeth, the few hairs of the nostrils: and the feet curled curiously round, like an animal that puts its fore-paw over its ducked head; and the hind-legs twisted indescribably up; and all skewered flat-wise upon the long iron rod, so that it was a complete flat pattern. It reminded me intensely of those distorted, slim-limbed, doo-like animals which figure on the old Lombard ornaments, distorted and curiously infolded upon themselves. Celtic illuminations also have these distorted, involuted creatures.

We asked him if the kid was for the evening meal—and he said it was. It would be good! And he said yes, and looked with chagrin at the bit of ash on the meat, where it had slipped. It is a point of honor that it should never touch the ash. Did they do all their meat this way? He said they did. And wasn't it difficult to put the kid thus on the iron rod? He said it was not easy, and he eyed the joint closely, and felt one of the forelegs, and muttered that was not fixed properly.

He spoke with a very soft mutter, hard to catch, and sideways, never to us direct. But his manner was gentle, so soft, muttering, reticent, sensitive. He asked us where we came from, and where we were going: always in his soft mutter. And what nation were we, were we French? Then he went on to say there was a war—but he thought it was finished. There was a war because the Austrians wanted to come into Italy again. But the French and the English came to help Italy. A lot of Sardinians had gone to it. But let us hope it is all finished. He thought it was—young men of Sorgono had been killed. He hoped it was finished.

Then he reached for the candle and peered at the kid. It was evident he was born the roaster. He held the candle and looked for a long time at the sizzling side of the meat, as if he would read portents. Then he held his spit to the fire again. And it was as if time immemorial were roasting itself another meal. I sat holding the candle.

This is an interesting picture, and charming in its way, and if one likes the mode of life that brings such pictures up, no doubt charm may be found in that. We find such descriptions preferable to the reality, and when presented with the virile style and fresh, crisp diction and phrasing and the penetrating insight and discrimination of Mr. Lawrence, they are fascinating and pleasing. Let us present one more, touched with real traveler's vision:

There is nothing to see in Nuoro: which, to tell the truth, is always a relief. Sightings are an irritating bore. Thank heaven there isn't a bit of Perugino or anything Pisan in the place: that I know of. Happy is the town that has nothing to show. What a lot of stunts and affectations it saves! Life is then life, not museum-stuffing. One could saunter along the rather inert, narrow, Monday-morning street, and see the women having a bit of a gossip, and see an old crone with a basket of bread on her head, and see the unwilling ones hanging back from work, and the whole current of industry disinclined to flow. Life is life and things are things. I am sick of gaping things, even Peruginos. I have had my thrills from Carpaccio and Botticelli. But now I've had enough. But I can always look an old, gray-bearded peasant in his earthy white drawers and his black waist-frill, wearing no coat or over-garment, but just croaking along beside his little ox-wagon. I am sick of "things," even Perugino.

One can hardly spend a more diverting hour or two than in skimming through this book, and in wondering what the crazy illustrations are for—page color cuts in the crude forms that have been adopted to conceal the lack of art, wherein a hooded Ku Kluxer may be seen riding a maroon horse through a grove of purple trees against a lemon yellow sky; the drawing as bad as the color, and looking like overlaid cut-outs by children of six years.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending June 17, 1922, were $146,100,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $134,000,000; an increase of $12,100,000.

The security markets have reached a point where it is difficult for the one who did not purchase a liberal supply of speculative and investment stocks around the low points of last fall to obtain a good yield on his money, with safety and with good prospects of profit. Some high-priced speculative favorites—and some of them were not high-priced when they and one copper stock. Ten shares of each may be bought for a total of $6440, on which annual dividends would amount to $350, or 5.4 per cent. on the total investment. Should all the non-dividend paying stocks resume payments, the yield would be largely increased, along with enhancement of quoted values.

Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company turns out a variety of hydraulic and marine machinery, along with farm tractors and electrical equipment, and a widely diversified list of machine products. Its output of mining pumps and machinery is likely to be favorably affected by resumption at the copper mines and general improvement in all branches of the mining industry. The company has developed a good, steady earning power in the last five or six years, and, although the common dividend is barely being covered at present, orders on the books are picking up and the outlook is for several years of good business. The company has no funded debt, and there is but $16,500,000 7 per cent. cumulative preferred stock ahead of the $25,770,750 common.

Atchison may probably be rated as America's premier railroad stock investment. The road's dividend policy has been conservative, with the result that its property has never been skimped as to maintenance or improvements. Its earnings made a very good comparison with those of other standard roads during the trying period of high costs and low revenues which led to government operation of the nation's transportation systems. If it is true, as many good judges of the railroad outlook declare, that the roads are about to enter a period of great prosperity, it would not be surprising to see the dividend on Atchison increased to at least 7 per cent.—and perhaps even 8 per cent.—within the next two years.

Baltimore & Ohio common is not only earning enough to resume common dividends, but it is to the road's distinct advantage to do so, for the reason that the legal status of its bonds depends on payments on the common stock this year. The most interesting feature of the Baltimore & Ohio situation has been the very large gains in freight revenue. During the war much freight that would normally have gone over the B. & O. was diverted to other roads by those in control of operations of the national system. That this traffic has swung back to the B. & O. and now appears to be in even larger volume than before the war is a most favorable development. The common stock has prospects of getting back to pre-war levels; and it will be remembered that from 1907 to 1914, inclusive, B. & O. common paid 6 per cent. annually, and sold between 75 and 122.

Bethlehem Steel "B" was the only one of the listed junior steels to show dividends earned in 1921. To that distinction must now be added the advantage of a supply of domestic iron ore and an expansion in its territory accomplished through the consolidation with Lackawanna Steel which only awaits government sanction for its consummation. Moreover, Lackawanna's unusually small proportion of funded debt will serve, in the combined capitalization of the merged concerns, to offset Bethlehem's heavy total of fixed-interest obligations. With prosperity ahead for the steel industry, Bethlehem Steel "B's" dividend looks safe for several years to come.

Central Leather may never get back to wartime high levels, but the stock is undoubtedly cheap at current levels. The leather industry was hard hit by the deflationary price movement, and it has been very slow to recover. But recovery has set in and is proceeding at an orderly pace. An important company in an important industry, Central Leather's earning power should gradually recuperate to such an extent as to give the common stock a quoted value considerably above current levels.

Kennecott Copper is probably nearer to dividend resumption than any of the non-dividend stocks in the group. Kennecott's strong point is its diversified holdings of stocks in other important copper-producing companies, among which are Utah Copper, Mother Lode, and Braden. With copper metal back close to the 14-cent level, and apparently headed higher, there seems to be no reason why a conservative management should much longer withhold payments to stockholders.

North American Company is a holding company, controlling such important public utility corporations as the Milwaukee Light, Heat & Traction Company, the Wisconsin Gas & Electric Company, and the Cleveland Electric Illuminating Company. Its earning power has recuperated rapidly within the last year or two, in response to a general lowering of costs and upward rate adjustments in various territories. Current earnings are estimated at around $12 a share, while dividends have recently been raised to $5 a share annually. A higher dividend rate and a proportionate advance in the stock is an attractive possibility of the future.

The Pacific Gas & Electric Company operates one of the largest aggregations of public utility properties in the United States, located on the Pacific Coast. Its operations have been steadily expanding for a number of years, and at a price to yield better than 7 per cent. this stock is one of the outstanding bargains of the public utility list.

Southern Pacific is one of the best of the standard rails to hold for a long pull, for the reason that it runs through a territory still in process of development and growth. Its terminal problems have been much easier of solution than those of old-line rails in the East, and its potential traffic growth can only be guessed. At a price to yield 6½ per cent., Southern Pacific is very attractive to the investor as well as to the speculator intending to hold for appreciation in quoted values.

It is significant that Westinghouse Electric is now selling at the highest price reached since the war market of 1916. There are probably two reasons for this. One is that stability of earnings has given the stock an investment rating which has necessitated a downward revision of the yield to be obtained. The other is that the enormous growth in the demand for the radio receiving sets that it manufactures promises to add materially to earnings over the next year or two. As a radio speculation, Westinghouse is probably entitled to leadership in the group of stocks

To one who has watched the slow advance from day to day, without checking up the high record prices so far established this year against the low records of 1921, this is rather startling information; but a glance at the leading paragraph under "Wall Street Pointers" will reveal the broad advances scored by a number of issues, says Forbes Magazine.

known to be benefiting from the expansion of the new industry.

The Equitable Trust Company of New York has been appointed transfer agent of the voting trust certificates of the International Railway Company.

Demand for funds for legitimate enterprises continues slack, consequently interest rates are still low. They will remain so until the four brotherhoods, which have never been reduced from war-time rates, will have to come down. The brotherhoods are so entrenched financially, that they can make a very stiff fight against any reduction, but the reduction must come. Public opinion is demanding it, and no man, or set of men, in the United States can go contrary to public opinion. All ordinary unskilled labor on the roads is now, according to the labor commissioners, still receiving better wages than the same class of labor in other fields. When the wages of the four brotherhoods are reduced, even further reductions can be made in freight rates.

None of these things are, of themselves, going to create an immediate demand for commodities. This demand is something distinct from prices. For instance, after the war, demand outran supply, at the highest prices ever known for similar commodities. This demand finally wore itself out. The buying public became as apathetic as it had formerly been enthusiastic. For years, business upon all stock exchanges was light. Recently there has been a very decided upward movement. The volume of business done in stocks has been unprecedented and prices have advanced beyond any one's expectation.

There is an improvement in trade conditions, but no man can say when there will be just as startling a trade revival as there has been in the stock market. It will come in time. No one can tell why or when. Demand will exceed supply and prices will advance. The prices of some commodities are already advancing. As prices advance, people will run over themselves to buy on a rising market, when they can not be persuaded or cajoled into buying on a falling market. In the first instance, they try to head off high prices. In the second they refrain from buying, hoping to reap still better bargains.

The offering of $422,500 Logan Municipal Irrigation District, Logan County, Colorado, serial 6 per cent. bonds is being made by the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company in denominations of $500 to yield 6½ per cent. These bonds are exempt from Federal income taxes. These are old seasoned bonds, the unmaturing portion of $468,000 issued in 1911. They are a prior tax lien concurrent with other general taxes, ranking ahead of mortgages and other private liens. There are 13,725 acres of irrigated lands, all under cultivation, directly taxed for payment of these bonds. The resident population within the district is approximately 3600. The average value per acre is $125. Taxes for payment of principal and interest of bonds are levied by the county commissioners and are collected by the county treasurer at the same time and together with state, county, and school taxes. The Great Western Sugar Company in 1921 paid $652,092 to growers for beets from 10,091 acres tributary to their delivery stations within the Logan district.

Most people have lost sight of the fact that twenty years ago interest rates on government bonds and other high-grade issues were 2½ per cent. to 3½ per cent.

Standard 3½ per cent. railroad bonds like those of the New York Central, for example, commanded premiums as high as 15 per cent. above par, say Bond & Goodwin & Tucker in their monthly letter. That was the top of a long upward swing. Shortly afterward began the inevitable downward swing, which reached its limits of low prices and high yields about two years ago. Economists say we are now in the beginning of another long upward swing (subject, of course, to occasional market fluctuations), and how far this will go toward the standards of twenty years ago no one can tell.

Students of economic conditions in Europe state that affairs are improving more rapidly than most people in this country imagine. The newspapers, of course, are filled with the political fomentations, and tend to give the impression that everything over there is in a state of chaos; but underneath the surface, basic conditions are gradually righting themselves. The people throughout Central Europe are at work, producing more than they consume, and extensive trade conditions with all parts of the world are being rapidly re-established.

In the United States people are beginning to realize that all signs are pointing to a marked industrial revival.

Never before has there been such a tremendous number of actual security buyers. Many of these buyers have been developed since the war, and thus far have shown only a small part of their ultimate buying power. It seems certain, therefore, that the recently developed buying movement will gather force and momentum as business confidence increases and that the demand for the more desirable securities will be such as to further materially increase prices and cut down the yields. Fortunate, indeed, is the investor whose funds permit the purchase of any of the sound, long-term or non-callable, high-yield securities which are still available.

The William R. Staats Company is offering $250,000 Austin Brothers Association first (closed) mortgage 7 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds, price 98 and interest to yield over 7.25 per cent. The company agrees to pay the 2 per cent. normal Federal income tax. These bonds are due February 1, 1932.

These bonds will constitute, in the opinion of counsel, a first (closed) mortgage on over 31,500 acres of land in Utah County, Utah; Caribou and Bannock counties, Idaho; Uinta County, Wyoming, and Elko County, Nevada, which property has been conservatively appraised at approximately $570,000, or two and one-fourth times the amount of these bonds. About 600 acres of this land are situated near there is a general awakening of the business world more pronounced than anything yet in sight. The recent cut in railroad rates should be of great benefit to both producers and consumers, says the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles in its monthly letter.

The reduction of wages of some four hundred thousand employees will enable the railroads, in part at least, to meet the cut in their revenues. Of course, it is only a matter of time when the wages of the members of

Salt Lake City and are suitable for sub-division and sale in small parcels for intensive farming, while over 8000 acres are ranches comprising irrigated bottom lands upon which is produced all the hay and alfalfa for the ranching operations.

The bonds will be a direct obligation and the only mortgage indebtedness of the Austin Brothers Association, which shows total assets as established by independent auditors, after giving effect to land valuations by our appraisers and to the current financing, in excess of $1,100,000, or $4400 per $1000 bond. The company covenants to maintain quick assets at all times during the life of these bonds in an amount equal to all its indebtedness, including bonds outstanding.

The business of this company is essentially the growing and feeding of sheep and cattle and was started about thirty-four years ago by individuals who are still associated in the management. On account of the unusually high quality maintained, the company's livestock has become widely and favorably known and it has been possible to market same at particularly attractive prices.

Average annual net earnings applicable to bond interest for the ten-year period ended September 30, 1921, with a much smaller capital than at present, and including heavy losses in the years 1920 and 1921, due to shrinkage in values of livestock and wool inventories, were $40,823.92, or two and one-third times annual interest charges on these bonds. These figures represent actual earnings from operations and do not include appreciation in values of land and livestock or other assets. Due to the present increase in capital investment and to other factors, net earnings in normal years hereafter should amount to approximately $75,000, or over four and one-fourth times annual interest charges on these bonds.

A new issue of $95,000 City of Dinuba, California, 5½ per cent. gold bonds, due serially from June 1, 1923, to June 1, 1954, is being offered by the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company. The issue is tax exempt in California and exempt from all Federal income taxes.

Dinuba is situated in the northern part of Tulare County, on the Southern Pacific and Santa Fé railroads, in the midst of a very rich farming and fruit section, midway between Fresno and Visalia. The tributary country is intensively farmed, is in a high state of development and the farms are well improved.

Dinuba is a well-built, modern city, with three banks with aggregate deposits of $2,306,000, municipal waterworks, electric lights, paved streets, good schools, churches and homes, several large packing plants, etc.

On November 6, 1792, Dumouriez defeated the Austrians at Jemappes, an event which led to the annexation of Belgium to the French Empire, says the New York Tribune. In 1911 this event was commemorated by the erection of a granite obelisk surmounted by a gilded bronze cock, over three meters high. On August 23, 1914, the Germans threw down the symbolical bird. On May 21st last the Gallic cock was restored to its former place, the occasion being marked with a joyous festival.

One feels quite a thrill of intrepidity in reviewing Mr. Hewlett's new essays, after reading his caustic comment on reviewers in his preface, "On Oneself." Still, though he berates the user of easy platitudes, we flatter ourselves that we belong to the more discriminating variety—"discerning" is Mr. Hewlett's word—for whom he has a word of praise. The "chuckle-headed reviewer," whom Mr. Hewlett scores so unmercifully, regretted that our author's latest was a departure from his early métier—the medieval romantic sort of thing. For our part, we are in no danger of repeating that blunder. We confess to liking the late Hewlett style and subject a long sight better than we ever did the early medieval manner. In fact, so delightful a book is "Wiltshire Essays" (Oxford University Press) that one must keep a weather eye out to guard against the platitudes and rhapsodies that Mr. Hewlett so dislikes. Our enjoyment of these leafy, sweet-smelling, breezy, and so restful glimpses of English countryside has been so great that we would fain not criticize at all, but merely revel in the delights that Mr. Hewlett has unrolled before our, at first, incredulous eyes. Is it possible that anything so quiet, so almost happy, exists anywhere in the world in these crazy Bolshevik times? One hopes that this time Mr. Hewlett is not romancing. If rural England is what he says it is, there is yet hope for the world. Still, Mr. Hewlett demands discrimination and discernment, and we are going to give it to him.

In the first place, Maurice Hewlett is a charming essayist. Since he has outgrown or cast off the quaint abstruseness that used to make reading his romances a tedious job to any but the enthusiast for archaisms, his style has become a pellucid joy forever. That means that rereading is as enjoyable as the first experience; and that one can browse slowly, even sleepily, over it with a sort of quiet intense pleasure. "Wiltshire Essays" are not to be undertaken or read quickly. To enjoy them fully one must have time to visualize, to smell, feel, and be in fancy where Mr. Hewlett is in fact. If you haven't time for this adventure in imagination, you can only superficially enjoy the essays as a piece of exquisite writing. Even that pleasure should not be ignored, but where Mr. Hewlett's essays differ from other well-written specimens of the genre is that he has lived his essays, not merely written them; and you must live them, not merely read them. "Wiltshire Essays" is one of the sincerest books of the century.

I have referred to "Wiltshire Essays" as something of a revelation with respect to rural English conditions. Reading them, one acquires a new respect for the English peasant—who, according to Mr. Hewlett, is as nearly a straight descendant of the British aborigines as it is possible for a race to be. Our admiration for them is akin to that felt for the American Indian before he was corrupted by our coming. However, the ancient Briton and his descendants throughout the centuries have not been corrupted by anything. He seems to be fairly incorruptible. Now this is where we are going to discriminate. Mr. Hewlett is a remarkably sympathetic chronicler, but we think he is biased. In fact, he is not logical. For, as an example of the incorruptibility of their race, he exploits the fact that the peasant woman retains an unembittered attitude toward life—whatever her vicissitudes—and that the peasant may sow his wild oats, but that he never, in our sense, "goes to the dogs." In our opinion these interesting facts are simply due to peasant stolidity—to the fact already quoted that this race is directly descended from prehistoric man (though how any of us escape that heritage is something of a mystery) and is actually closer to animal existence than are the more sophisticated modern races. However, if Mr. Hewlett argues that that is their peculiar merit, we have nothing further to say. For certainly the races who have got farthest away from their prehistoric ancestry have nothing half so attractive to offer.

Notes of Books and Authors.

The Pope has written an essay on mountain climbing which will be published in book form in English by Mr. Fisher Unwin. The English publisher received the manuscript through Cardinal Gasquet.

In Berlin it is rumored among the gossips that large parts of the memoirs of the ex-Crown Prince were written by Karl Rosner, the war correspondent of the Berliner Lokal-anzeiger.

Rider Haggard has a new book out, published by Doubleday, Page & Co. It is a story of Norman England and is said to faithfully recreate the England of 1066.

H. G. Wells claims that he owes his career to poor health. He was the son of a small tradesman and actually was himself a hosier's apprentice. "If it had not been for the fact that my health failed," Mr. Wells has said in reference to his start in life, "probably I should now be the proprietor of a little business over the door of which would be inscribed 'Herbert G. Wells, Cash Draper.'"

Rudyard Kipling has a Browningsque taste in seasons. Spring is his favorite. He usually spends it at Batemans, his 500-acre farm on the Sussex Downs. He puts in three hours writing every morning in his study up among the gables of the rambling old Elizabethan house. But his afternoons are devoted to farm management.

The reader who is not a scholar, but who has an intelligent interest in scholarly subjects will welcome the news that Sir James G. Frazer's encyclopedic work on folklore, "Golden Bough," is to be issued in an abridged single-volume edition this fall. Folklorists and anthropologists regard "Golden Bough" as their standard work.

On June 9th Charles Scribner's Sons published George Santayana's "Soliloquies" in England and Later Soliloquies"; a new volume of poems by Olive Tilford Dargan, called "Lute and Furrow"; "Signs of Sanity," by Stewart Paton, lecturer on neuro-biology at Princeton University and on psychiatry at Columbia University; "The Direction of Human Evolution," by Professor Edwin Grant Conklin, first published in 1921, and now reissued with a new preface by the author; and a volume of sixteen modern one-act plays, selected and edited by B. Roland Lewis, head of the department of English of the University of Utah.

"Broken Stowage," by David W. Bone, which has just been published by E. P. Dutton & Co., is a collection of sea yarns, essays, and sketches, by the author of that classic of the sailing ship, "The Brass-bounder," also a Dutton book. The title "Broken Stowage" is taken from the seaman's term for the small packages which are used to fill up the odd corners of the cargo of a sea-going ship—and is indicative of the humor and pathos, the good and bad fortune, and the varied experiences on sea and in port which have gone into the making of the book.

To those who respond to the magic of Bret Harte's name it will be of interest to hear that the Stockton (California) Chamber of Commerce has prepared a large map of the land in which Bret Harte lived, and of which he wrote. Illustrations and quotations from the authorized editions of his works, which are published by the Houghton Mifflin Company, are shown on it in such a manner that the actual places he wrote about can be instantly identified. Many tourists will benefit this summer by this opportunity to become even more closely acquainted with the country which, it might almost be said, was first annexed to the United States by Bret Harte.

Two of the Pulitzer prizes in American letters for the year 1921 were awarded to Macmillan authors. The prize of $1000 for the best volume of verse published in 1921 was received by Edwin Arlington Robinson for his "Collected Poems." The prize of $1000 for the best biography teaching patriotic and unselfish service to the people was awarded to Hamlin Garland for his "Daughter of the Middle Border," which completes the story of the life of Mr. Garland's parents, and with his earlier volume, "A Son of the Middle Border," forms a remarkable record of the intimate social history of midland America from the end of the civil war to the beginning of the world war.

The Nobel Prize Address, delivered by Max Planck before the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences on "The Origin and Development of the Quantum Theory," has been translated and will be published, probably next month, by the Oxford University Press American Branch.

R. Thurston Hopkins, whose ramblings through the Hardy country have just appeared in his new book, "Thomas Hardy's Dorset" (Appleton), claims a picturesque ancestry. His mother's family were Irish, while his father's were English gypsies. He says: "My father was the last of a very ancient family of gypsy horsebreeders, who settled in East Anglia, and my immersion in the secrets and strange ways of strange people must account for my unquenchable love of the 'wind upon the heath' combined with an almost equal love for every vagrant and vagabond I meet on the road."

One of the most interesting surmises as to the origin of William Sidney Porter's famous pen name, "O. Henry," is as follows: In a biographical article on O. Henry in the Nation in 1918, the author, a Professor Smith, suggested Porter's pseudonym had been inspired by the author of several standard pharmaceutical works. Professor Smith's original surmise has been given considerable substantiation through his receipt of a book published in Paris in 1858 and entitled "Traité Pratique d'Analyse Chimique des Eaux Minérales, Potables et Economiques." It is written by "Ossian Henry père et Ossian Henry Henry" occurs twenty-four times as the author or authors of pharmaceutical articles. When it is remembered that the short story writer was a drug clerk in North Carolina, Texas, and Ohio, that he necessarily had a copy of the "United States Dispensary" always by him, and that the name "O. Henry" appears in the "Dispensary" (just as it appears in the "Analyse Chimique") as the originator of some of the commonest prescriptions, the conclusion, according to Dr. Smith, is irresistible that the French pharmacist furnished the now famous pen name.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

The Dark House.

Miss Wylie, author of "The Dark House," is one of the group of really serious young English writers whose books, whatever their individual failings, are sincere. This school, of which Sheila Kaye Smith is a member, and which for some reason seems to run largely to women, is not so much marked by cleverness or startling originality as by seriousness and thoughtfulness. Their books are refreshing reading as an occasional oasis of sincerity in vast stretches of sandy mirage.

"The Dark House" harks back to the standard type of English novel that records the life of a man from infancy to maturity—type of so many of Dickens' and the other Victorian writers' and in fact of the first English novels—Fielding's. These biographical novels are always about unusual persons, and Robert Stonchouse, Miss Wylie's hero, is no exception. It is a powerful story that is at once poignant and a little cynical.

Plots and Personalities.

To label a book "psychological" is to relegate it to a corner for specialists only, and that is just what ought not to be done to "Plots and Personalities." Although theoretically this book is even more special than the usual popular psychology, since it is research in the field of creative fiction, it is nevertheless far more readable than most inquiries into the workings of the human mind.

Dr. Slosson's point of departure was the use of newspaper "personals" as imagination tests after the fashion of the intelligence tests of Binet and others. People with a hobby for this sort of thing will find the "personals" game both novel and instructive. But it does seem a bit unfair to your unsuspecting guests to take the measure of their fancy in this fashion. Imagination, like humor, is a sine qua non for which one politely gives everybody the benefit of the doubt. The writer, incipient and arrived, will regard "Plots and Personalities" as a regular treasure trove, and it is safe to say that every one interested intelligently in literature will be attracted to this analysis of the imaginative faculty.

Some Political Ideas and Persons.

Essays are quite the fashion. Mr. John Bailey, literary critic of the London Times, and one of the foremost of English essayists, has just published his first volume on a political subject—"Some Political Ideas and Persons." Though political in flavor, Mr. Bailey's book has its literary leanings. He leads off with a critical discussion of Lytton Strachey's "Queen Victoria" and himself writes a very authentic study of that much written about queen. The four stages of Disraeli's political career are considered in turn and with reference to Buckle's great work on Dizzy. Biographical chapters on several British statesmen are interesting because of their freshness of treatment, and the book concludes with half a dozen essays on general subjects of national and international interest.

Terribly Intimate Portraits.

Something new in the way of parodies has been perpetrated by Noel Coward in "Terribly Intimate Portraits." Mr. Coward has taken his cue from the epidemic of memoirs and journals from which we have been suffering, and has written in addition to "My American Diary" a number of burlesque memoirs that are reminiscent of Beerbohm's parody novels. Mr. Coward is a very catholic historian. His terribly intimate portraits range from historic mistresses to American senators—a fact that indicates his versatility only when one remembers that lives of historic court beauties are usually written by women and those of latter-day politicians by their press agents.

One of the most hilarious features of the book is the illustrations. Any one whose æsthetic nerve has been irritated and his humorous nerve titillated by the invariably ugly likenesses that accompany the lives of great beauties will appreciate these awful portraits. Either our ancestors were a very much politer race than we in recording each other's physical attributes or they had a strangely different taste. True, our newspapers invariably refer to the beautiful Mrs. X and the lovely daughter of So-and-So, but our biographers have broken away from the euphemistic tradition and serve each other up with a candor only equaled by one's glass in the early morning. Lorn MacNaughton, Mr. Coward's illustrator, has taken a lot off our chest with those execrable portraits, and Mr. Coward should be given a vote of thanks for relieving all our feelings concerning the published diary stuff as well as the historic and modern memoir. "Terribly Intimate Portraits" should make excellent summer reading.

A useful desk book for the office is "Everyday Uses of English," by Maurice H. Wesen. The first half of Professor Wesen's book is devoted to business English—letters of complaint and adjustment, sales, applications, inquiry, acknowledgment, etc., and business reports. The latter half is a regulation rhetoric, dealing with paragraph writing, manuscript preparation, word study, punctuation, etc. The books will make a good text for school and college courses in business English and is a concise handbook for the business office.

A Test for Dr. Einstein.

The next solar eclipse will occur on September 27th in the southern hemisphere, and most countries will send missions to study the phenomenon, which, according to M. Lucien Chassaing, writing in Le Journal, will assume particular importance this year. It is hoped to make measurements and experiments that will perhaps definitely determine the value of the famous Einstein theories. And then the whole system of the universe is at stake, the whole conception of modern mechanics may become questionable, says the New York Tribune.

Einstein affirms, contrary to the generally accepted thesis, that there is no ether—that is to say, no material medium to transmit light rays, and that neither space nor time has an absolute value. He arrives at these conclusions only with the aid of long and complicated calculations which mathematicians alone are able to contest or admit. And controversy has not been wanting.

But Dr. Einstein, after five years of battles in the domain of theory, in 1915 wanted to give experimental proof of the solidity of his ideas, however revolutionary they might appear. "If luminous energy emitted by a star has weight," he said, "it must be deviated, attracted when passing in the field of gravitation (i. e., near the sun)."

Demonstration of this, unfortunately, is not at the constant demand of men. True, there was in August, 1915, an eclipse visible on the coasts of Africa and of Spain, but there was also the war, which turned away the initiative. Einstein has designated a few stars which, according to him, would find themselves on the photographic plates at angular distances from the verge of the sun, other than Newton's law permitted to foresee, and he had indicated the differences that ought to be verified. The Royal Society, despite the unfavorable circumstances, sent an astronomer to Sfax, a seaport town of Tunis, on the Gulf of Gabes. His implements were, however, not sufficient, the atmosphere was foggy—in short, the plates obtained did not permit a sufficient verification.

Dr. Einstein has so far not yet finally decided whether he will accept the invitation of the Holland government to take part in an expedition for the observation of the solar eclipse, going to the Christmas Islands, in the Indian Ocean.

Arthur Machen, writes Paul Jordan Smith in the Wave, looks like a very handsome and much idealized Dr. Johnson—a part, by the way, which he was called upon to act some time ago during the Johnsonian festivities in London—united to the courtliness and hospitality of a before-the-war Virginia gentleman. Catholic, urbane, with a delightful sense of humor, he combines the qualities of an Anatole France and an English aristocrat.

"THE CIRCLE."

Such a large number of people have read Maugham's sardonically brilliant play that, generally speaking, the theatre-going public knows to what point the circle had slowly revolved when the family history of the luckless Champion-Cheneys began to repeat itself. Reading the play, however, seems to whet the appetite to see it. The play of character upon character, the curious inter-relations of the oddly-assorted group, the sardonic observation by Lady Kitty's deeply-wronged husband, which is shared by the spectator, the tone of worldly cynicism colored by the bitter humor of the man who was capable of writing "The Moon and Sixpence," the profound interest of the situation, the worldly ease with which it is met by all save Lady Kitty's son and her elderly possessor, and the corroding wit of the dialogue unite in making the play a piece of unusually telling dramatic situations.

Here are two triangular groups: the one young, the other elderly. Both belong to the proudest, most exclusive, most approachable, most easy-going, most conservative, most luxurious aristocracy in Europe. Position in the hill-top classes of England is such a privilege, the life is so carefully laid out for the ritual of pleasure, the free-masonry between the privileged members of this sacredly guarded enclosure is so absolute that once possession has been enjoyed it is a tragedy to lose it. It clings to its possessors like fangs into flesh, and tears and rends when severance comes.

In "The Circle," however, Somerset Maugham shows how, in the face of admonition, pleas, and a horrible example, the most powerful force in nature conquers, for the human heart will have its way.

The romanticist will take little satisfaction from observing how completely the forces of undisciplined love rule in "The Circle," unless he can throw aside sentiment and view with detached satiric interest the disportings of lovers defying society.

One thrill we enjoyed, however: the moment when the lovers, smashing all privilege with reckless hands, sped away in each other's arms through the night. It was a lawless thrill, carefully worked up by the keenly perceptive author, who yielded us that and several other moments in which to give ourselves over to sentiment.

The play is full of intensely interesting situations, but they are handled by a master of technique with an avoidance of stereotype, a keen perception of the satiric, and an unconventionality in the colloquialism of the characters which is highly stimulating.

It is always a godsend to find meaty rôles for skilled and well-known players whose time for playing a part in the drama of youth is over, and it was excellent business on the part of an astute management to put forward two such well-known figures as those of Mrs. Leslie Carter and John Drew.

Besides these two outstanding figures the nine or ten characters are represented in first-class style by a very well-balanced and carefully selected company.

Mrs. Leslie Carter is the personage in the play exciting the most interested anticipation. That is probably why Lord Porteous was so ungallant as to enter the Champion-Cheney portal preceding his fair companion; this allowing Mrs. Carter the more effective and more eagerly applauded entrance.

Mrs. Carter is fairly dazzling in the display of the sumptuous harness of a decayed belle hanging on desperately to the vain glads of a past beauty, and in the opulence of snow-white and richly-jeweled arms, bosom, and shoulders. Facial beauty was never her strong point, but, nevertheless, she was always an eye-absorbing figure on the stage, and has not lost the gift. The criante costumes she wears are most carefully selected, but the first one is a hummer, and shows that the lady possesses a sense of humor, even if nothing else did. Especially about the skirt and the covering of her legs and feet did Lady Kitty indicate that she belonged to the ranks of ladies whose clothes must draw the excited observation their charms no longer awake.

I do not doubt that Mrs. Carter has been much admired and praised for delineation of Lady Kitty become a painted, dyed, lip-sticked and bedizened near-sexagenarian. But, excellent business though it was to choose her for the rôle, highly entertaining though she succeeds in making Lady Kitty to a thoroughly amused and probably generally approving audience, to my mind she does not present the Lady Kitty created by Maugham. We will put aside the thought of petiteness suggested by Lady Kitty's characteristic name, for height is an accident, and can not be altered by stage make-up. But Lady Catherine Champion-Cheney had been born and lived an aristocrat. Being battered around in shady European society composed of déclassées and their disreputable companions had stripped Lady Kitty of some of her patrician aura. Her fastidiousness was gone, her thoughts and ideas sullied, but the carefully inculcated manners of the highly placed are like a skin, and not easily shed. Mrs. Carter's Lady Kitty did not suggest the former élégante, but a low-born woman endeavoring, by being pronounced in appearance, dress, and demeanor to convince those around her that she was in her natural entourage. She even put more than a touch of caricature in the portrait, so that the character was, most of the time, incongruous with the atmosphere of genuine drawing-room comedy.

Thus Lady Kitty, instead of being a long faded, but still well-bred beauty of a past day whose mind and heart had deteriorated with her fading person, and in whom dragged ethics and besmirched morals showed too plainly in the discourse of a woman whose life had developed shallowness, insincerity, and inconsequence, was become, well, approximately a figure of fun.

Maugham's Lady Kitty was real, but Mrs. Carter's was an amusing burlesque; and not a burlesque of a deteriorated aristocrat, but of a robustly assertive woman risen from the people to the uncertain eminence occupied by the still tolerated mistress of a wealthy nobleman. No doubt Mrs. Carter wished to point the contrast between the two women, but in burlesquing the character she rather missed the cue.

Betty Linley was as delicately restrained in her depiction of the character of Elizabeth, the young wife, as Mrs. Carter was robustly assertive. She is a woman of interesting personality, and a sort of wistful charm. Delicate-featured and slight, she seemed almost too elusive, too much like the blessed damozel to carry out the conception of a modern young matron snatching avidly at happiness with an utter disregard of others. But no, Elizabeth was supposed to be a phantom of delight; a puzzling compound of old-time romanticism and modern adventurousness in the realm of lawless freedom.

Perhaps the endeavor to suggest the modern young intrinsigant was why Miss Linley gave Elizabeth bobbed hair, to us, nowadays at least, become rather the badge of the commoner.

Miss Linley expressed very prettily yet always with a sort of wistful restraint, as if Elizabeth's love were too troubling to the mood of her dominant and rather roughly possessive lover, the moods of tenderness that swept over her as a trembling hand might sweep the strings of a harp. The young actress has one disqualification: a non-carrying voice. But perhaps it can be developed.

John Drew was exactly as the character was drawn by the author: a man so antagonized by the atmosphere of perfumed artificiality and insincerity in which he had rashly cast his fate that he takes refuge from it in ill-tempered candor and a testy destruction of pretense. Lord Porteous is the only really likable man in the play, and we find it in our hearts to be sorry for him and forgive him.

Ernest Lawford gave an extremely clever and perfectly satisfying presentation of that exceedingly sardonic and amused observer, the wronged husband of thirty years back. There was a considerable amount of English accent clashing around, and several harsh male voices in the company, so that words and phrases were sometimes lost. But Mr. Lawford acts, and speaks, and makes his points with a deliberate, unhurried art that is most telling; and he also was thoroughly in the character.

Robert Rendel was a perfectly appropriate figure as the son, and conveyed with ability the idea of a rather bloodless precisian. But he is not distinct enough to do himself full justice.

This is not a fault with which we can reproach John Halliday, whose manner of half-smothered, brooding earnestness accorded with the character of a man who loved inarticulately, but with a sort of fierce male possessiveness.

Three subordinate characters were duly in line with the general finish of the performance, which was much above the ordinary.

"The Circle" is laid down with the most skillful of technique, and the dialogue is brilliant in its revelation of character and situation. One can, however, detect a few inconsistencies; for the Lady Kitty prattling inconsequently about "my boy" and "my lip stick" is not the same Lady Kitty who talks worldly wisdom and social philosophy to Elizabeth. Nor is the Clive Champion-Cheney who sardonically and with pleased amusement contemplated the mess Lord Porteous and his mature inamorata had made of their lives the same man upon whose fatuously self-approving laughter the curtain falls. The fatuousness of the laughter rather jolts us, because the Clive Champion-Cheney previously delineated couldn't possibly be fatuous. But the playwright was leading up to a good curtain, and having manoeuvred it skillfully, cajoled us into overlooking the discrepancy. It was an effective curtain to a rattling good play. But Mr. Maugham puts not a single pinfeather in the wings of idealism; and for that the romanticists and the idealists will not love it.

"MR. PIM PASSES BY."

Having already seen "Belinda" at the Maitland Theatre, and "The Lucky One," a play of more serious purport, we did not feel entirely unacquainted with the style and character of the plays of the extremely popular playwright, A. A. Milne. He has written quite a number, winning fame at a comparatively early period in his career. "The Dover Road," "The Great Broxopp," and "Mr. Pim Passes By" are those which won the special favor of English theatre-goers, their success having been almost duplicated in New York. "The Truth About Blayds," his latest play, shows the inevitable advance made by a man of ideas, the greater gravity in the treatment resulting from a very serious theme: a life-long literary imposition practiced by a famous Victorian poet. This play we must hope to see, for reviewers hail it as the work of a dramatist who adds real luster to British dramatic literature.

"Mr. Pim Passes By" is a delightful comedy, so light and gayly casual in the tone of its fun and humor that it is not until the involuntary bigamist-suspect goes off into a fit of hysterics over a fishbone that we perceive the underlying purpose of the piece: which is that the law should intervene to legitimize a happy marital union made in good faith under the impression that a criminal, and former marital partner of one of the contracting pair was dead.

The play begins with the casual advent of the senile Mr. Pim, whose decaying memory precipitates upon a perfectly happy and satisfied married pair the spectre of separation. Mr. Milne uses a blithe madcap of nineteen, who loves to talk and has no reserves, for putting the audience au fait. The author has not yet achieved impeccable art as a dramatist, for his device of using Dinah as a mouthpiece for placing characters and situation works with an occasional mechanical click. Also he has, in "The Truth About Blayds," as well as in some of his other plays, acted as a rather improbably benevolent Providence in bringing about a happy dénouement.

But his faults are few, his virtues many. His humor, generally fresh and unforced, has a tinge of originality, and much charm, when

Battlefield and Reservoir

From a battlefield where Indian braves slaughtered one another in a great and bloody conflict to an artificial lake impounding billions of gallons of water for San Francisco—that is the history of the Calaveras Reservoir of the Spring Valley Water Company.

A tradition older than California history has perpetuated the fact, but not the details of that Indian battle. When numerous human bones were found on the old battlefield—grim relics of the ancient fight—the valley was named Calaveras or "Skulls."

Calaveras Valley is in the mountains of the Coast Range, midway between Niles Cañon and Mount Hamilton. It straddles the boundary line of Alameda and Santa Clara Counties.

The construction by Spring Valley of a dam across the northern outlet of this valley made the Calaveras Reservoir.

This huge Calaveras Dam has a present capacity of 8 billion gallons of water for the supply of San Francisco.

Under an agreement with the City and County of San Francisco the Railroad Commission requires Spring Valley to enlarge this dam to a height of 175 feet, so that it will impound 32 billion gallons of water, thus adding 24 million gallons daily to the water supply of San Francisco.

The design of Calaveras, however, provides for an ultimate height of 210 feet, at which height it will yield 50 million gallons daily, doubling the present water supply of this city.

The Indian Valley of Skulls of prehistoric times is today the scene of engineering activities enhancing its value in the beneficent service of a great metropolis.

it does not lose its spontaneity, and gay caljology of our delighted participation.

That scene in which young Dinah babbles out every necessary bit of information to the vague-minded old Pim requires the lightest, most careless of touches; the animal spirits of a happy girl to whom life is so full of fun, and joy, and delight that even the passing octogenarian must share her blithe humor which should bubble like champagne with youthful effervescence.

They have a pretty young English girl in the part, who assumes all the quick changes of girlish attitudes, whose intonations and facial changes are carefully studied and worked out in detail. The trouble is that we know it too well, for the young thing—Alison Bradshaw by name—is a mere girl, and has not yet mastered the ability to make studied detail seem natural, careless, and unpremeditated.

Leonard Mudie, also English apparently, a good-looking partner in the lively nonsense effervescing from the comely pair, has more abandon than the young lady, and the youthful pair are very pleasing to the eyes.

But it is not until Laura Hope Crews comes in that we surrender ourselves to the immense satisfaction of seeing a player whose natural humor is entirely in accord with that of the author. Laura Hope Crews plays the part of the second wife of a profoundly conventional and outwardly, inwardly, and completely respectable conformist to tradition. She is blonde, plump, and pleasing; young enough to beguile the proprietary affections of her middle-aged partner, mature enough to understand his temperamental limitations, perspicacious enough in her womanly wisdom to do full justice to the sterling excellences of his character.

All this Laura Hope Crews expresses without words, and with an economy of effort and a prodigality of return that made her every look, and gesture, and word a mine of delight.

She is a natural humorist of the subtle type, for she never stresses the humor which colors every syllable that falls from her lips. The two women, the delightful senior and the fresh, pretty girl, made a marked contrast, the first by fitting into her rôle so completely that she made it impossible for us to imagine another Olivia Marden, the other by making it palpable that she was acting. However, in externals the dainty girl was most pleasing, and greater experience will probably lessen the too obvious strenuousness of her effort.

The entrance of Dudley Digges provided further grounds for rich satisfaction, this actor playing opposite Miss Crews with a similar absence of inartistic emphasis, and an equal of that quiet, involuntary humor that is so enjoyable because it is unisistent.

The happy ease with which this delightful actor accomplished his effects showed in all that he did, but probably the numerous wives in the audience took special joy in the scene in which a blundering, bungling husband, animated by an honest but inarticulate affection, seeks, by the exercise of a laughably childlike diplomacy, to propitiate the adored but offended goddess on his hearthstone who guides his marital destinies.

It was a perfect scene, perfectly acted by a pair of players who understand the delightful art of conveying humor by suggestion; which is always needed in satiric comedy.

Other good players, although of lesser rank, were Erskine Sanford, who, in every respect but aged voice—the simulation being too palpable—made an excellent Mr. Pim, and Augusta Haviland, who represented the alarming Lady Marden with the duly terrifying clamping of jaws of a British dowager who is a man-eater.

Geniality, originality, a touch of satire, humor that is devoid of sting, are the very pleasant qualities of A. A. Milne, who first demonstrated in the pages of London Punch that it was his mission and his pleasure to give the world mirth that is wholesome and salutary.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

"Mr. Pim" passes into his second week at the Columbia Theatre next Monday night, June 26th. This delightful comedy has attracted large houses, which derive from it the full measure of clean fun. The original New York company, sent here by A. L. Erlanger, is a distinguished one. The performance is characterized by the highest excellence, and the scene in which Laura Hope Crews as the leading lady teases her husband to exasperation by her demands for a second proposal has been generally voted one of the best comedy situations of recent years. Columbia patrons continue to manifest a due appreciation of this wholesome play.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Few stars ever achieved the same measure of success in a play as Leo Carrillo did in "Lombardi, Ltd." For years Mr. Carrillo was one of vaudeville's most entertaining monologists. His character stories were inimitable.

The following revue of Duci de Kerejarto from a New York paper describes the young genius and has been echoed by the press of the world: "This young violinist is one of the most dazzling phenomena upon the firmament of art. Just as he is great enough to interpret Handel, just so is he possessed of the power convincingly to convey to us the emotions and fantasies of a child."

Stan Stanley knows how to make people laugh. It is quite a long time since he has been out on this Coast, as the East would not let him go. He has the greatest of all of the gifts of the entertainer, a genius for extemporaneous wit, and it is a certainty that his admirers and hearers will declare him as good a comedian as they have ever laughed with.

Harry Carroll, one of America's youngest and most successful song composers, has a snappy song and dance revue, called "Varieties of 1922," in which he is assisted by the Love Sisters, Tom Dingle, Patsy Delaney, and "Six Slick Chicks."

"The Show-Off" is one of the best comedy sketches that have hit vaudeville this season. It mirrors an irresistibly funny character, admirably played by Fred Sumner, a sterling player.

Paul Murray and Gladys Gerrish are theatrical astronomers. They are always studying stage stars. Accurately and cleverly they offer their impressions of Marilyn Miller and Ann Pennington, and reflect various high lights from Broadway successes.

"Skeet" Gallagher and Irene Martin are a geyser of fun. There is probably a psychological reason for their laughs, but they are too busy getting laughs to bother to find out what it is.

Eugene Varg and company have a humorous novelty which will prove a delight to all.

BRINGING BACK OLD TIMES.

One concrete result of the Days of '49 celebration has been the general revival of interest in the mining industry of the West, which has been dormant for many years, says the Sacramento Union. Not since the discovery of gold in California has the mining of gold and silver received such an impetus as given by the revivification of "the days of gold." But yesterday the country gave little thought to the gold and silver of California and Nevada; mining items received scant space in newspapers, and the industry that brought the now prosperous West into being was almost forgotten. Today inquiries as to gold and silver mining in California and Nevada are being made, and once more people are awakening to the potentialities of mining conducted along modern lines.

Those idyls of the Argonauts of 1849, Bret Harte's wonder tales of pioneer California, have been dusted off and read intently during the past two months. The majority of his stories deal with the early mines. Re-reading of these stories has awakened a universal interest in gold and silver mining, and has sharply called attention to the fortunes that still wait man beneath the earth's crust. Mark Twain's "Roughing It" and other stories of his experiences in the heyday of mining in California and Nevada have also been eagerly read.

The celebration sharply called to mind the vast difference between the crude mining methods of the 'forty-niners, who wasted nearly as much gold as they wrested from the earth, and the modernized methods of the present day, which have changed gold and silver mining from a speculative venture to a manufacturing industry. The same plan which put copper mining on a firm industrial basis, mining vast areas and putting the quartz through a great centralized mill, is being adopted today. Of the thousands of visitors from other states to Sacramento, hundreds made special trips to the operating mines, and returned home enthusiastic over the revival of mining prospects in the ever-changing West.

THE SIBERIAN MUDDLE.

The latest clash between Japanese troops and Chita forces adds one more trouble to the record of difficulties that has been the sole return the empire has received from its Siberian campaign, says the Herald of Asia, a Japanese weekly published at Tokyo. It is true that England and the United States have no reason to feel proud of their records in Siberia; but at least these countries were wise enough, even though wisdom was somewhat belated, to withdraw their forces "while the going was good." But we missed our opportunity, and as a result we have been reaping the whirlwind with unflinching regularity.

It is true that Japan has far more at stake in Siberia than have these other countries, but our continued military occupation has not helped our situation. On the contrary, we have sacrificed many lives and many millions of treasure. The presence of our troops did not prevent the Nikolaiefsky massacre; it is far more likely that it served as a contributory cause thereto. The gains which have been made by our merchants, fishermen, and other civilians have been utterly trivial in comparison with the great sums of public money expended; and it is extremely probable that Japan's position commercially in respect to Siberia would have been far better had our troops been withdrawn long ago than it may possibly be now, when it can not be denied that the general feeling of the Siberians toward the Japanese is one of ill will.

It may be said that the Japanese expedition served two good purposes: namely, originally at least, that of preventing the huge military stores accumulated at Vladivostok from falling into hostile hands and of protecting our mercantile interests in that city; secondly, that of preventing the scourge of Bolshevism from penetrating into Japanese territory, especially Korea. However, the first purpose could probably have been met as well by maintaining a fairly powerful naval force at Vladivostok, and it seems plain that the situation there might be met today by the presence of a few ships which might guarantee protection of the city. As to the keeping of a strict quarantine on Bolshevism, this task is undoubtedly one which Japan must continue to undertake for her own sake and that of the world at large; but this might be done far more properly by maintaining our forces on our own border rather than within a neighbor's domain.

That the troubles which have taken place recently will damage our international standing is certain. It goes without saying that the Japanese troops could not be expected to suffer attack—if that is what happened—and refrain from retaliating, but even this argument will always be countered with the charge that they had no business in Siberia in the first place. Of course, at the Washington Conference no definite date was set for the withdrawal of the Japanese troops; but nevertheless Japan would seem to be under a strong moral obligation to effect a withdrawal fairly speedily, and it is certain that this is being expected by the world. The confidence and respect of other nations which Japan gained at Washington stands in great danger of being lost on account of this Siberian muddle. Certainly the game is not worth the candle.

Even though it should be shown that in this specific case Japan could have acted only as she did, it is certain that the matter will be treated in the international press something like this: The Japanese military authorities announced that the troops were about to be withdrawn, but that a clash was likely. Significantly, the clash followed immediately. Japan, rearing that the Genoa Conference might bring about some kind of recognition of Russia, precipitated this clash in order to provide an excuse for postponing evacuation.

No matter what may have been the actual facts, the events which have taken place lend themselves to such a coloring. No matter how anxiously the Japanese people may wish to see the withdrawal effected, the world will point to the outstanding fact that the troops are in Siberia. It is true that the situation is difficult, that no soldier may wish to appear to be placed in the position of withdrawing under attack; but there is no likelihood that the situation will improve.

On the contrary, one need but refer to the speech made by Trotsky before the Ninth Soviet Congress in Moscow, when he said: "Shall we remove our troops from the territory of the Far Eastern Republic? No, we can regret only that there are not enough of our troops there to defend our territories properly. But we are certain that the time will soon come when Red bayonets will be strong enough to repel the attacks of these insolent Imperialist vultures."

It is evident that continued occupation can lead but to continued and increased trouble. No one is so foolish as to believe that Japan fears the Reds—it would be too absurd—but it would be the height of absurdity for Japan to allow herself to be drawn into a conflict which could have no possible gain for her, as we have repeatedly gone on record as having no ambitions of territorial conquest in Siberia.

Unless Siberia is evacuated by our forces, we lay ourselves open to strong suspicion of wishing to violate both that promise and that of evacuating in the near future. Our old troublesome reputation of being a militaristic country will remain with us and will interfere with our development along commercial lines. We are losing constantly lives, money, the friendship of the Russians with whom we shall presently wish to trade, and our international standing. And there is not the slightest thing to be gained. It is a case of "heads you win and tails we lose." We must not allow the military men to lead us further into this Siberian muddle. There is only one thing to do, and that is to put an end to the matter, as we should have done long ago.

The associations, literary and other, of Genoa are being reviewed on all sides. Shelley was drowned in the Mediterranean within sight of the house in Genoa where he and Byron lived. Byron's house there bears an inscription commemorating his residence. The house in which Dickens spent many months and wrote his "Pictures from Italy" has not been similarly distinguished. Its identity is now lost. Perhaps it has been torn down. The great marble quarries of Carrara are near Genoa and hence the place is thick with sculptor's studios. Because of the same fact the Genoese cemetery, the Campo Santo, is the most remarkable in Europe. It is calculated that the Genoese have spent millions on Carrara marble to commemorate their dead. Mark Twain is one of the American memories of Genoa. The city figures in his "Innocents Abroad."

VANITY FAIR.

There was a time when lobbying was respectable. It is now felt by many persons to be one of the wickedest of all the devices the devil has employed to ensnare and corrupt mankind. And there are those that believe we have in Washington a particularly insidious form of it known as the "social lobby," which ensnares and corrupts, and otherwise does the work of the devil, by means of tea. It has been intimated that an eminent senator was floated into the Senate, after he had gone hopelessly aground on his state primary shoals, by a tidal wave of tea, poured from a hundred silver spouts by as many or more velvet-armed, taper-fingered, and otherwise charming Washington hostesses. The matter has been investigated by an apparently competent observer, and his deductions are published in the current Ladies' Home Journal as peculiarly interesting to ladies, which we have no doubt it is; but inasmuch as some men appear to read this department, and inasmuch as men still have an interest in their country, and probably will continue to have until their political interests have been swamped by the feminine movement, we think it advisable to call attention to it here. The country is even threatened with a novel about it, to come from the frazzled goose quill of former Senator Kenyon of Iowa, now a judge of the United States Circuit Court in that rebellious state. Judges do not usually write novels (that is, good ones), so we may take it as a warning. Judge Kenyon appears to have examined this latest phase of the "horrors of peace," and he thinks it is real, and so should make good fiction. On the other hand, Mrs. Medill McCormick and Mrs. Alice Roosevelt Longworth are inclined to say "Bosh!" Whether it is a thing that can be successfully boshed away like that is a question. The novel may settle it. Few things can survive novelization—especially by an amateur.

Tea has been found a solvent for many social problems that have vexed mankind, so perhaps it is potent in political problems. It is more subtle and delicate than money corruption, of which Judge Kenyon thinks there has been a salutary subsidence. Dinners and receptions are forms of the social activity symbolized by tea, and they are said to have their part in the formation of policies and laws. It is even declared that in order to know how some senator or representative is going to vote it is well to know where he has been dining, or teasing; and that to understand in full the news in the political columns of the press it is also necessary to read the Washington society news. Washington real estate has even been sold to Uncle Sam by charming ladies you would never suspect of real estate, through the agency of a few choice invitations. If the thing stopped there no very great harm might come of it, for real estate is, after all, limited, but apparently it does not stop there. It is said that a man may go to Washington a pure and undefiled patriot, a Galahad in heart, a warrior battling for the down-trodden and oppressed with every fibre of his leather lungs and catgut vocal chords, and if he doesn't watch out the tea-pourers will get him. The technique seems to consist of dangling before the eyes of his wife an invitation to swizzle Young Hyson or Orange Pekoe and then presenting to the husband a suggestion of the other side of the case. That, of course, as the Alabama judge said, confuses the mind of the court, and no warrior for the right ought to stand it. But if he doesn't, he and his wife will soon note a falling off in invitations, and may have to buy their tea at a grocery; to say nothing of missing theatre tickets, motor rides, and little attentions of that sort. President Wilson called attention to the insidious nature of the lobby infesting Washington in his day, and the Senate thought it well to have a vindication, known at Washington as an investigation; they are the same. It seems to have been a success, but the subject still wanders about the whispering galleries of the capital, and it has recently been discovered that Senator Capper, manager of the farmer bloc, than which nothing could be more pure in heart, has been taking dancing lessons. If that means anything it means that the republic is in peril again. We do not believe that Tom Watson of Georgia would take dancing lessons, and everybody knows what an incorruptible, flag-saluting patriot he is. Nor do we think what he drinks is tea. As for Senator Capper, his weakness is home-made candy. If others are found vulnerable at that point, Washington society may find itself committed to candy pulls. That should help all good men to stick together. It is a hard matter to keep our politics as pure as we could wish. It has probably been complicated, at least for a time, by letting the women out of the harem; but it is too late to correct that now.

Americans love to look at royalty. That phenomenon has been ascribed to snobishness, but the theory is unsound. It is not snobishness that underlies the curious fact, but economy. As a people, we are still Scotch tight, which is proved by the fact that for more than twenty years we have not for one waking moment ceased to yell about the high cost of living. And the reason we love royalty is that it is a goodly human spectacle, paid for by some one else. We would not pay for it, but as long as other people do, we love to look at it. Many Americans attended the recent royal nuptials at Belgrade, where King Alexander of Jugo-Slovakia, after a good many starts in other directions that got nowhere, was finally forced by circumstances into a "love match," as the women reporters are so fond of calling it, with Princess Marie of Roumania. While numbers of Americans in England were practicing touching their toes without bending their knees so that they would be able to bend double gracefully at court, another lot representative of the crowds that throng Fifth and Madison Avenues when a millionaire wedding is billed for St. Thomas' or St. Bartholomew's was thinking up the right way to get into the grandstand at Belgrade. The ukase had gone forth, "None but Americans of prominence permitted in the grandstand," or something to that effect, which it was thought by the managers would shut out practically the entire American contingent. They did not understand the American, bent on seeing royalty with his own eyes—especially royalty about to enter a hymeneal condition. For every non-prominent American at Belgrade there was a "prominent" American who was dead. These could not better serve their countrymen in extremity than by lending them their names. So, as the Servians were not familiar with our necrology, the grandstand burgeoned with some of the greatest Yankees that ever lived. The Hall of Fame would have looked like a nickelodeon beside it. If the Belgradeans wanted "prominent" Americans we have them in plenty. No royal wedding in half a century has been so honored. It is even said that a lot of our motion-picture stars were present, and for that we hope royalty will be duly grateful. It was more than King Alexander could have expected, more than he ever deserved. The marriage was a great success, so much so that a marriage mania is said to have developed throughout Jugo-Slavia, and the churches are swamped with applications for licenses. We have heard of something of the sort in the early days of Utah, when it was said that if a woman left a skirt hanging on a fence post some man would come along before night and propose to it. As to this particular wedding, it is being loudly and positively asserted that it will stabilize conditions among the nations of southeastern Europe and prevent wars between the Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, and Roumanians. Bosh! Why should it?

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

When Mary was four she was given a Boston puppy which she insisted on taking to bed with her. Next morning she was cross and tired. Her mother anxiously inquired if she had not slept well. "No, mother," said Mary, "Brindle was crying all night for his mummy. So I stayed awake and made awful faces at him all night to make him think I was his bulldog mummy."

A suit tried by the late Sir Francis Jeune in the English divorce courts is said to be one of the briefest on record. Sir Francis summed up the case as follows: "If the husband were the brute the wife says he is, she is well rid of him. If, on the other hand, he is the saint he makes himself out, he is far too good for any woman. Consider your verdict, gentlemen."

The Rt. Rev. Sir David Hunter Blair tells a story of a colleague, a bishop, who rode out on a long round of leaving-calls, attended by a new groom. Before setting out the bishop had sent the man back to the house to get some cards. When they reached the last house the order was: "Leave two cards here, James." The unexpected reply of the groom was: "I can't, my lord. There's only the ace of spades left."

Sir James Denham, in his recently published memoirs, quotes the following as an example of unconscious Irish wit. Lady Ashbourne, wife of the lord chancellor of Ireland, was proceeding in her carriage to a viceregal drawing-room at Dublin Castle. She was stopped by a policeman to whom she angrily said, "You must let me pass. I am the wife of a cabinet minister." "Indeed, mum," the Irish constable answered, "I couldn't let you pass, not even if you was the wife of a Presbyterian minister."

Governor Small of Illinois was recently discussing the advantages and disadvantages of large life-insurance policies. It was remarked that Rodman Wannamaker and Pierpont Morgan carry million-dollar policies. "For the average man a large insurance has its advantages," said Governor Small, "but it also has its drawbacks. A lawyer earning about $3000 a year was insured for $60,000. He was once reported dead, but it was a false alarm. He cabled to his partner: 'I survived. Try to break it gently to my wife.'"

Theodore Dreiser, the novelist, compares the modern exponent of the lost art of criticism to the woman who was going through a picture gallery with her husband. They stopped at a picture called "Saved"—a picture of a dripping Newfoundland dog standing over a dripping and unconscious child that he had just rescued from a near-by stream. The woman, who typifies the modern critic, studied the painting with great interest. "No wonder the poor child has fainted," she said, "after dragging that great big dog out of the water."

Mrs. Somerset Maugham, wife of the author of "The Circle," is an expert in house decoration. She and a friend, also an author's wife, were putting the finishing touches to the latter's new house when a mutual friend called and wished to be shown over it. The visitor, however, expressed surprise. "How is it," she asked, "that in your books you describe stately mansions and ancestral halls. But when you build you put up a little house like this?" "Well," Mrs. Maugham explained, "it's because words are cheaper than bricks, you know."

Here is an old story on the ex-Kaiser exhumed from an early number of the Argonaut: "It is said that the Kaiser, at a recent review in Berlin, reprimanded old General von Meerscheidt for losing his mind at a critical moment. 'If your majesty thinks that I am getting too old, I beg of you to allow me to resign.' 'No, no,' replied the Kaiser, 'you are too young to resign. Indeed, if your blood didn't course through your veins so fast, you would be a more useful army leader.' On the evening of that day the Kaiser and the general met at a court ball. The general was talking to some young ladies. 'Ah, Meerscheidt,' cried William, 'that is right; get ready to marry. Take a young wife, then that excitable temperament of yours will vanish.' The general bowed low as he retorted: 'I beg to be excused, your majesty! A young emperor and a young wife would be more than I could possibly stand.'"

A fashionable wedding was being celebrated in Philadelphia at one of the exclusive social clubs. One couple arrived very early, and in alighting from the vehicle the gentleman slipped and ripped his trousers in a very noticeable manner. His wife hurried him into the "ladies' retiring room." Owing to their early arrival, there was no one in this room but the maid, who was well supplied with needle, thread, buttons, etc., for emergencies. The wife placed her husband behind a screen; he passed his trousers over to her, and she handed them to the maid for repairs. Before the trousers had been mended a number of women were trying to get into the room, and the wife was trying to hold them out. At last she turned in despair to a door just back of her husband, pulled it open, shoved him through, and slammed the door. The husband pounded on the door and yelled, "For goodness sake, let me in! I am in the ball-room!"

Margaret L. O'Brien, secretary of the Domestic Servants' League, said in an address in Chicago: "If a servant is a hard worker she has a right to brag about it. The thing, however, shouldn't be carried too far. A missionary in India was waited on by a stately Indian, an applicant for the post of cook. The interview was satisfactory, and the missionary said at the end: 'I guess I'll engage you. By the way, though, what's your religion?' 'Beg pardon, sar,' said the Indian, 'I am heathen.' 'Heathen? What do you mean by that?' said the missionary. 'Beg pardon, sar, I am worshipper of stocks and stones.' 'My gracious,' said the missionary, 'I'm afraid I can't employ such a character as that.' 'Beg pardon, sar,' said the Indian, 'for thy dear sake work so dam hard no time to worship anything.'"

The original pawnbrokers were the bankers, and the humorous epithet "uncle" is said to be from the Latin uncus, a hook on which the brokers hung their pledges.

To Lady Astor.

Hail, beautiful lady, world renowned,
And hail to this, your latest capture
With Goldenrod and Roses crowned
Who pads at heel with purrs of rapture.
Can this sweet cat with fluffy pate
In blissful thralldom to your charms
Be the same beast that ramps irate
Upon Great Britain's arms!

'Tis proud indeed we'll be some day,
Who witnessed the incipient stages
Of your triumphal march, to say,
"We saw her started down the ages!"
And by the way, dear, since you're quite Well headed for the Hall of Fame,
Don't hold your Lion's leash too tight
Lest he forget he's tame.

'Tis true he lets you cut his claws
And trim his beard or curl or shave it—
And knit wool mittens for his paws,
And bob his mane, or marcel-wave it,
But Lions have their limits, take Life's friendly tip upon the quiet
And don't attempt, for heaven's sake,
To "pussyfoot" his diet!

Record Price for a First Folio.

At Sotheby's several weeks ago the famous Daniel first folio of Shakespeare was sold to Dr. Rosenbach, the Philadelphia dealer, for the sensational price of £8600.

This is not far from double the price ever paid for a first folio in the auction room, says the Manchester Guardian. Last year £4200 was given for an inferior copy at Sotheby's. The Daniel folio is one of the three finest copies of the 180 that are known to be in existence. It was bought in 1864 by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts for £716. That was the highest price any copy had reached up to that time. In commenting on that sale a leading newspaper of the day remarked that the day would come "when our children's children will hear that it has been sold for ten times that sum."

It is supposed that about 500 copies were printed in 1623, and the original price was something like a sovereign. Down to 1907 the usual price for a good folio was about £2000, but in that year a folio which had belonged to Frederick Locker-Lampson made £3600. That copy was bought by Mr. Henry Widener, who was drowned in the Titanic. His library was presented to Harvard University.

Besides this copy several famous first folios have been lost to America during the last few years. In 1905 an American dealer gave £10,000 for first, second, third, and fourth folios together.

It was the morning of the new curate's first sermon, and he was most anxious to make a good impression. As he was rather a vain young man he turned to the old verger and asked sotto voce: "Could you get me a glass? A small one will do." The verger hurriedly departed, but soon returned with something under his coat. "I know what it is to be nervous," he said kindly. "I've brought you a whole bottle." The curate blushed and gasped, for he was not a drinking man. "But—but—" he began. "Ssh!" said the verger. "I'd never have got it if I hadn't said it was for you."

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

The engagement of Miss Maud Fay and Captain Powers Symington, U. S. N., was announced on Wednesday, June 14th. The date for the wedding has been set for July 12th, and is to be celebrated at the Fay home on Grove Street. On the day following the wedding Captain Symington and his bride will leave for the East, where Captain Symington is to be stationed at the New York Navy Yard. Miss Maud Fay is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence A. Fay and the sister of Mrs. Marshall Dill, Mrs. Kirby Crittenden, Miss Mary Fay, Mr. Charles W. Fay, Mr. Stanley Fay, Mr. Paul Fay, Mr. Clarence Fay and Mr. Philip Fay. Captain Symington is a member of a Baltimore family, and a graduate of the Naval Academy in 1892. He has been stationed in San Francisco for the past year as chief of the inspection board. For five years he was naval attaché at the American Embassy in London. Miss Fay has had a successful career as an opera singer, almost entirely in Europe, and her plans were to return to Europe, possibly to resume her career. Her plans known to her friends, the recent announcement of Miss Fay's engagement came as a surprise.

Mrs. Seward B. McNear entertained in honor of her sister, Miss Nina Barroll, at her country home at Ross on Wednesday. Miss Barroll came from her home in the East to attend the wedding of her niece, Miss Amanda McNear, to Mr. William Hendrickson, Jr. At the luncheon on Wednesday Mrs. McNear's guests were Mrs. Benjamin Gunn, Mrs. Robert J. Davis, Mrs. John McKee, Mrs. Carroll Camborn, Mrs. Charles Foster, Mrs. Milton Esberg, Mrs. Charles Belden, Mrs. William Plummer, Mrs. Winfield Scott Davis, Mrs. George Young, Mrs. Gustavus Zeil, Mrs. Alfred Du Bois and Mrs. James Kendall Armsby.

Complimenting Miss Josephine Moore, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Moore, who is to marry Mr. Dean Dillman, Mrs. Hubert Law gave a luncheon at the San Francisco Golf and Country Club. Among those who were asked to meet Miss Moore were Mrs. Alfred Swinnerton, Mrs. Cleveland Forbes, Mrs. L. E. W. Pioda, Mrs. Max Rothschild, Mrs. Eli Wied, Mrs. Lester Herrick, Mrs. Robert Roos, Mrs. Harry H. Scott, Mrs. Marshall Madison, Miss Dorothy Crawford, Miss Lucy Hanchett and Miss Alice Hanchett.

Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Lowery and Miss Edna Taylor gave an al fresco dinner party for Miss Martin, the debutante daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Martin, on Saturday evening, at the Menlo Country Club. More than one hundred and fifty friends of Mr. and Mrs. Lowery and Miss Taylor were present.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Jackling entertained at dinner last Wednesday evening in honor of Miss Elizabeth Schmiedell and her fiancé, Mr. James Moffitt, who are to be married in the fall.

Admiral Edward Eberle, commander-in-chief of the Pacific fleet, entertained a group of his friends at luncheon aboard his flagship, the U. S. S. California. Rear-Admiral and Mrs. Hutchison, Rear-Admiral Alexander Halstead, Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Mr. and Mrs. Rennie P. Schwerin, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Leicester, Mr. and Mrs. Philip E. Bowles, Commodore and Mrs. James Bull and Captain Powers Symington were among the guests.

Mrs. William C. Lyon was hostess at an informal tea on Wednesday afternoon at her apartment on Hyde Street. The affair was to have been in honor of Mrs. Robert McMillan, who was expected from New Orleans, but her trip was delayed and she did not reach San Francisco until Sunday. Mrs. Lyon's guests on Wednesday were Mrs. Alexander D. Keyes, Mrs. Frank W. Griffin, Mrs. Alfred Baker Spaulding, Mrs. Constance Peters, Mrs. James Hall Bishop, Mrs. Benjamin Thorpe, Mrs. George Cluff and Mrs. Eugene Payne.

Fiction in England, by English authors, is usually out-sold in this country by the American editions of the same books. Says a recent number of John O'London's Weekly, an English periodical: "It is always interesting to hear how many copies of a novel have been sold, though this may have nothing to do with its quality. One might guess that Mr. John Galsworthy's 'To Let' has sold twenty thousand copies. The sale of Mr. A. S. M. Hutchinson's 'If Winter Comes' would be greater, say thirty thousand copies, because its appeal is more popular. We were into November before Mr. Hugh Walpole's 'Young Enchanted' appeared, but it has a record of fifteen thousand copies. By mid-autumn Miss Sheila Kaye-Smith's 'Joanna Godden' has sold eight thousand copies, and was going well." The American sales of "If Winter Comes" were over two hundred thousand copies for the same period and the demand for this book has continued so steadily that the American publishers announce the 325th thousand in less than six months from the date of printing. A number of causes contribute to this situation. To begin with, the United States is a country infinitely more wealthy than England, and with over twice as large a population. In addition to this the book-buying section of our country is greater in proportion to the total number of inhabitants, due to different social conditions. The English reading public, furthermore, are in the habit of getting their fiction from lending libraries rather than at the book store. As a British author said: "America's the place. Why, people actually buy books there."

Poland is said to be the one country in Europe which preserves its national costume. The traditional dress, which varies in different districts, dates from the middle ages and has been a symbol of Polish patriotism during alien rule.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Ghost

I have been dead so long;
I wish that I could find
The little house among the trees
Where everything was kind;
The dawn against the window panes,
The pictures on the wall—
And human hands and human words
Were kinder than all.

I must have lost the way
(I have been dead so long)—
The paths are choked with bramble
And all the roads are wrong.
It stood upon the hillside,
The chimneys touched the sky,
And twilight lingered longest there
To kiss the day good-by.

Within its doors is peace—
But I have lost the way,
And long and bitter are the miles
That run to Yesterday.
I wonder is it still the same,
The candle light, the song,
The laughter?—I shall never know;
I have been dead so long.
—Victor Starbuck in the Forum.

The Happy Ducks.

The happy ducks, whose life I tell,
They have a brook where they can sail,
Which winds and winds, as on they fare,
Past treats few ducks can know elsewhere.

Past garden walls deep-mossed and mellow
And harboring tepid slugs they swallow
With joy-closed eyes, then on their heads
They stand in varied waterweeds—

White star-flowered weed that sure must taste
Like comfits for a naiad's guest,
And long persuasive weeds that flows
In ripples smooth to stroke their toes;

Beneath a bridge so tiny made
In size it seems designed to shade
Three sleepy ducks rather than be Walked on by folk the size of me.

Then where two willow-rows contain
The stream in leaves, like lovers' lane,
Through which they vanish from my eyes
In distant fields marked checker-wise

With dykes, just near enough to show
The banks are flowered through which they go.
How dull the ducks must be, what fools,
That live in yards and stagnant pools!
—Camilla Doyle in "The Chapbook."

A Ballade of Photographs.

Behold, O Fortune's favored one
To whom this dainty Book may fall,
Pachmarri, Muttra, Brindaban,
Shall rise before you at your call—
Benares' ghat, the Agra Hall,
And verdant slopes of Ranikhet,
Are yours to gaze upon in all
The pomp of full-plate cabinet.

Mussoorie woods and boulders dun,
Dead homes of kings and streams that crawl
Leagues broad beneath a burning sun
And green bamboo embattled wall—
A silver tarn, a floating yawl,
Squat shrine and Muslim minaret,
Are yours, at price exceeding small
In pomp of full-plate cabinet.

And have you ne'er let Fancy run
Athwart the East we hold in thrall;
And have you ne'er with rod or gun
Left dusty lines or dreary Mall?
Then turn the page where torrents brawl
And Nature's sumptuous throne is set
'Twixt giant rock and leafage tall
In pomp of full-plate cabinet.

L'ENVOI.

Prince or Princess, you have won
This Book with gorgeous views beset,
Procure a camera and run
Yourself to full-plate cabinet.
—Rudyard Kipling in "The Wave."

Jardin du Luxembourg.

Over the wall bends the lilac spray.
The fountain bows to a wanton breeze
That urges the little one to their play
(Whipping their tops 'neath the chestnut-trees).
See them a-scamper by twos and threes,
Skipping within their gay hoops' wide ring—
Gaudy of bonnet and bare of knees!
Paris is sweet in the northern spring!

Sail-boats skim over a mimic bay,
Bound for a make-believe Antipodes.
That one has foundered. A-well-a-day,
For its boy-owner's small argosies!
Now he drains sorrow's cup to the lees.
Tears to his red cheeks salt courses bring,
Mercifully brief—childhood's agonies!
Paris is sweet in the northern spring!

Graceful the peach-blossoms weave and sway
Through the grille's twisted interstices.
That queer old rag-picker over the way—
How does he feel on such days as these?
Watch that fruit-vendor fight off the bees.
Profits have set his wits wandering.
He has no need for the Pleiades!
Paris is sweet in the northern spring!

L'ENVOI.

Winter, farewell! How your fantasies
(Frost-sketched to beauty bewildering)
Lose all their charm to your blast and freeze!
Paris is sweet in the northern spring!
—William Van Wyck in "Jessica's Book."

The mounted remains of Winchester, the horse on which General Sheridan made his famous ride through the valley of Virginia, has been moved from the Governor's Island Museum and is being taken to the Smithsonian Institution.

Death of Mary B. Graham.

Mrs. Mary Bremerton Graham, widow of the late Major-General William Montrose Graham, U. S. A., died at Annapolis, Maryland, on June 14th. General Graham was stationed at the Presidio of San Francisco from 1887 to 1896, and he and Mrs. Graham had many friends in this city.

Mrs. Graham's maiden name was Mary Bremerton Ricketts, and she was born at Fort Fairfield, Maine, in 1843. She was the daughter of Major-General James Bremerton Ricketts, U. S. A., and his first wife, Harriet Josephine Pierce, a niece of President Franklin Pierce. With Mrs. Graham at her death were all her surviving children: Mrs. Burrage, wife of Rear-Admiral Guy Hamilton Burrage, U. S. N.; Mrs. Alden, wife of Professor Carroll Storrs Alden, U. S. Naval Academy; Mrs. Scales, wife of Rear-Admiral Archibald Henderson Scales, U. S. N., and Colonel James Malcolm Graham, U. S. A.

The horse-racing season started the other day at Moscow, after an interruption of five years. The attendance of the public was large, despite the admission fee of 1,000,000 rubles. The promoter made profits of amounts expressed in astronomical figures. The ladies were dressed in the latest fashion. The orchestra played the "Internationale" and various marches. The entire new bourgeoisie had come and rivaled the Soviet aristocrats in the spending of money. The Pravda complains that such luxury was not seen even in the time of the Czars.

Institute of Architects' New President.

The American Institute of Architects, of which William B. Faville of San Francisco has just been elected the nineteenth president, was organized in 1857. Its first president was Richard Upjohn; and some others honored with that responsibility were Richard Hunt, Daniel H. Burnham, Charles F. McKim and George B. Post. The object was to unite the architects of the country in an effort to promote the aesthetic, scientific, and practical efficiency of the profession so that it might be of increasing service to society.

The institute is an organization of local chapters, ready to render assistance in public undertakings by personal service or as a society of trained professional men in their chosen work. For example, the San Francisco chapter was called upon to assist the procedure of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition leading to the architectural programme. The members are held to high standards of practice and conduct as a safeguard for the financial, technical, and aesthetic interests entrusted to them. They must be men of integrity as well as ability, for they guide the public in the design, not only of the public, but of the private building whose quality reveals the importance of the community in modern civilization.

Mr. Faville, who is the first president of the institute to be elected west of the Rocky Mountains, is a member of the firm of Bliss & Faville. He is a native of California and was graduated from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology at Boston. For five years he was affiliated with McKim, Mead & White of New York. His firm has executed many of the fine buildings of the city, such as the Masonic Temple Building, the Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Building, the Columbia Theatre, the St. Francis Hotel, the James Flood residence, and the State Building now being erected on the Civic Centre. Mr. Faville was a member of the Architectural Council of the Exposition, and was the designer of the Great Wall which bound the whole design together.

The Passing of the Serenade.

Sad indeed to lovers of the picturesque is the news which comes from Seville. The serenade, from time immemorial the quintessence of romance, is passing away and will soon be known no more, according to the New York Tribune. Worst of all, it is being destroyed by nothing else than modern and unromantic football. This game is at present in full vogue in Spain. Everywhere young men are passionately addicted to it, in Seville as elsewhere, so that the young Sevillians have no longer time as formerly to cultivate the song, the guitar, and the mandolin. Football engrosses them.

Soon one will not find a single lover capable of playing a serenade under the balcony of his Dulcinea. If Rosina opens her window Almaguiva will not be there to declare to her his passion.

But lately, on Saturdays, the young Sevillians assembled and wandered through the streets of the town singing to the stars. Today they go to bed early so as to be the next morning in good form for their favorite game.

The British Astronomical Association is now of the opinion that the Martian "canals" are vegetation, their peculiar shape being the results of moist air currents which blow from the poles to the equator.

An American actress, writing in a Chicago newspaper, says she has been married three times. The theory in Los Angeles is that she has not been trying or is merely an amateur at the business.—Punch.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"Ever keep a diary, Weary?" "Wot's dat?"
 "A record of wot a feller does." "Naw! De cops attend ter dat."—Boston Transcript.

Apprentice—What is in this bottle with no label? Chemist—That's what you use when you can't read the prescription.—Stockholm
Kasper.

"What's wrong between you and Freddy?
 You used to be inseparable." "Can it be possible you haven't heard? We're married now, my dear!"—Judge.

Robust Traveler—Buck up, old chap!
 There's nothing like the sea—finest tonic in the world. Friend (with weak stomach)—
 Good emetic, too.—Punch.

Shoe Clerk—What size would you like, madam? Customer—I'd like a No. 3, but there's no use talking about that. Show me a No. 5.—London Answers.

"Jagsby always insists that his friends drink first." "That used to be a mark of courtesy." "But now?" "It indicates discretion."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

The Mistress—Really, Justine, you are wearing very pretty silk stockings. The Maid —Don't be uneasy, madame; I got these at my last situation.—London Opinion.

Labor Agitator (after witnessing his first football match)—That's what I call organized labor, comrade. One blast from the whistle and every man stops immediately.—Punch.

"I see you are specializing in a new drink called 'Reminiscence.'" "Yes," said the druggist. "Why the name?" "It's soft stuff but it has a cherry in it."—Birmingham Age- Herald.

Mr. Toller—A man has left a million pounds for respectable bachelors and widowers. Mr. Coates—That seems a lot of money to leave two or three men.—London
Answers.

Husband—Your extravagance is awful!
 When I die you'll probably have to beg!
 Wife—Well, I should be better off than some poor woman who never had any practice.—Pearson's Weekly.

"Here's a man found nine pearls in an oyster stew. Wonderful, hey?" "Oh, fairly startling. I thought you were going to try to lead me to believe he found nine oysters."
 —Louisville Courier-Journal.

Millionaire (speaking to body of students)
 —All my success, all my tremendous financial prestige, I owe to one thing alone—pluck, pluck, pluck. Student—But how are we to find the right people to pluck?—Dinuba (Calif-) ornia) Sentinel.

"When we go to Boston next week, dear, what d'y' say we go by boat?" "No, George, it's no use; they don't go outside the three-mile limit. And, besides, they're so dreadfully particular now whom they let land in this country."—Judge.

Mr.—Have you heard that Sjoberg's wife has run away? Mrs.—No, indeed! Poor fellow! How did he take it? Mr.—Well, he has now calmed down a little, but for the first few days he was delirious with joy.—
Stockholm Kasper.

"Which weeds are the easiest to kill?"
 asked young Flickers of Farmer Sassfrass, as he watched that good man at his work.
 "Widow's weeds," replied the farmer. "You have only to say 'Wilt thou?' and they wilt."
 —London Weekly Telegraph.

"Do you claim to know all about finance?"
 "No," admitted Farmer Cornstassel. "I'm free to confess some of us farmers who talk about finance don't know any more about the subject than some of the financiers who talk about farming."—Washington Star.

Ded broke (roused by his wife)—What's that you say, a burglar? Mrs. Ded broke—Yes. Fancy a burglar calling on us! Ded-broke—Let him climb in; then I'll give him a yell and it may make him drop something he has stolen elsewhere.—Boston Transcript.

Manager—We must put a great deal of realism into this forest scene. Can you get some one to growl so as to resemble a bear?
 Assistant—I think so. There are six or seven chorus men who have not received their wages for three weeks. I'll call them.—Pear- son's Weekly.

"Who is the wisest man mentioned in the Scriptures?" asked a teacher of one of her Sunday-school class. "Paul," exclaimed the little fellow, confidently. "Oh, no, Johnny; Paul was a very good man, but Solomon is mentioned as the wisest man." "Well, my father says Paul was the wisest man, because he never married, and I think my father ought to know."—Los Angeles Times.

The Berliner Helicopter.

Perhaps the greatest forward step which has been made by the Berliners in the development of the helicopter, or flying machine to rise vertically, is the forward motion, says the Washington Post. This has been the stumbling block to all who have worked such machines. Henry Berliner asserts that in his machine this difficulty has been completely overcome.

The forward motion is accomplished by means of a small tilting propeller installed on the rear of the fuselage. By tilting this one way, the entire machine is tilted. If the tilting propeller is inclined to an angle of fifteen degrees there is a loss in lifting power of a little less than 3 per cent. This, however, gives a horizontal push of 25 per cent.

Leave Nothing to Chance When You Go Away For Your Vacation

Don't "take a chance" and leave your silverware, jewelry, valuable papers, etc., in the house when you are going away for the summer. You may, on your return, find everything as you left it, but—

Isn't it a great deal better to put your valuables in a place of safety and have perfect peace of mind all the time you're away?

of the lifting power. Helicopters have been perfected to the point of rising from the ground before this. In 1919 Henry Berliner, conducting experiments near this city, succeeded to this extent. The discovery of means of obtaining forward motion, however, is only just completed.

The body of the helicopter is something like an airplane. In the front, on either side, are the lifting propellers fourteen feet long.
 These revolve in opposite directions and are operated by means of a revolving motor in front of the driver's seat.

One of the things which has hampered the inventors in their experiments is the difficulty of obtaining a sufficiently powerful motor.
 The motor now in use is 110 horsepower, while the entire machine has a weight of 1350 pounds. With a 150-horsepower revolving motor the Berliners believe that the ultimate in perfection will be reached. Such a powerful motor is now being built for government departments, and Mr. Berliner says that he expects to obtain one of these for installation on the helicopter.

Our Disabled Veterans.

San Francisco has had a number of conventions lately, but none it has been more delighted to entertain than the Disabled Veterans; it is sorry they are disabled, but glad they are here. There was no lack of enthusiasm in the greetings these men received when they paraded up Market Street last Tuesday; and even if there had appeared to be any hesitancy or want of vigor in the acclamations of the spectators, which there was not, it would have been owing to a certain fatigue of the public nerves after so many recent spectacular parades and other outdoor excitements. There is nothing too good for the men that lost limbs and health while upholding the honor and adding to the grand traditions of this country on European battlefields. Those that were not wounded came back better prepared for life than when they left, better trained than they would have been if they had never gone. But the men who actually were maimed, or whose vigor was impaired by some long period of invalidism resulting from the hardships of the service, have real and great claims, which no good citizen would ever be disposed to discount. These are the men chosen by the God of Battles to give of their body and blood as a sacrifice that liberty might not perish beneath the iron heels of Prussianism. They are the peers of the heroes of Salamis, who fought to save a dawning Occidental civilization and Occidental individualism from the Persian, with his Oriental conceptions of despotism and slavery—conceptions which the German ideas of human relations strangely match, and with which Western theories of right and justice will be endlessly at war. No fighting men in history have been called upon to endure more than these men endured, or dare more than these men dared. And the sight of their medals and their honorable scars is a thing to catch the throat and stop the breath. It is more than ever borne in upon the people of this vicinity that if there is any help they still need, and we are assured there is, and lots of it, their cases should have consideration at Washington before all ordinary and most of the extraordinary business of the nation. This does not mean the forwarding of the bonus bill—that is another matter entirely. These men are in a different case and class. The government does not mean to be ungenerous, and is already expending huge sums to help them, but unavoidable administrative difficulties, too easily dismissed as "red tape," have put themselves in the way of complete disposal of the matter. According to Judge Marx, national commander of the organization, more hospitals and hospital beds are needed for the tubercular and mentally disabled, although $18,000,000 was appropriated by Congress a year and half ago for this purpose; this in addition to the accommodations for 30,000 men now in hospital. This authority makes no unreasonable demand when he says the new accommodations should be provided with the same speed with which the barracks and cantonments were built in the crisis of war. Men are still dying daily from the illnesses and ailments caused by their service, and the accommodations should be expanded to save as many as possible. There is complaint that employers of disabled veterans discount their salaries by the compensation pensions they are known to receive. If that is a fact, it is a particularly mean and ugly fact, of which any American should be ashamed. Better treatment should be accorded, and we have no doubt will be, once public sentiment becomes conscious of the fact and the circumstances. Nothing within reason is too good for these men, nothing they actually need should be denied to one of them.

The Senatorial Contest.

The exhausted patience of many intelligent Californians with the sterile and obstructive courses of Senator Johnson, as well as with his persistent alliance with William R. Hearst, has at last raised up an opposition that may result in his defeat. Charles C. Moore has been induced to run against him for the Republican nomination, and so one of the strongest personalities in the state has been called again into the public service. He has the support of such influential men in the Republican party as Marshall Stimson, Chester H. Rowell, Marshall Hale and other progressives. Moore will be most distinctly remembered as the president of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, the most successful exposition ever held in this country, and without doubt the most beautiful one ever held in the world. He built the entire organization that constructed and operated the Exposition, and it was one of the most effective organizations ever put together. He may also be remembered by many as the head of the State Council of Defense during the war, a body which practically coordinated and directed all the war activities of the state for the time of its functioning, and which concluded its services with the highest credit. What the public may not so clearly recall is the fact that in 1908 and 1909 Moore, as chairman of the executive committee of the Citizens' Health Committee, saved this city from an epidemic that in all probability would have devastated it as cities were devastated in the Middle Ages, and would have spread to other parts of California and perhaps a considerable part of the country back of it. This was the first time his great organizing and executive abilities were brought conspicuously into the public service. Without him the Federal sanitary experts would have been unable to do much more than quarantine the city. Moore organized practically the whole population and directed a campaign which was not only successful in stamping out the disease so that it never reappeared, but returned 19 per cent. of the funds publicly subscribed. It was a feat at that time without parallel, and it saved, not only the lives of thousands of citizens, but the commerce and wealth of the city and the employment and well-being of its inhabitants. In undertaking his present fight against the barren policies and the misrepresentative character of Senator Johnson, Mr. Moore has merely responded again to the call of public duty, for he did not seek the honor, nor can it be said of him that he ever sought a single one of the high posts he has held. A Republican, he advocated the League of Nations; and strongly favored the disarmament treaties which Senator Johnson has opposed. The Argonaut can not predict how this fight will result. It starts late, against a man who will be defended by the resources of machine politics, and the influence of the Hearst press. But at any rate it is a gallant adventure which will bear fruit in the future consolidation of the best forces of the community. Judicious persons feel that the situation presents more than a forlorn hope. It is a fighting chance, commanded by a most resourceful fighting man.

More Private War.

If the Illinois massacre had been committed by an invading force of Germans the whole country would be under arms and the wretched state and county officials who permitted it would be swept aside like rotten planks in a flood. Striking miners of Williamson County have flung their challenge straight into the face of America. Their motto was "No Mercy." To such a hellish doctrine we could not, as a people, even in retaliation subscribe; but surely it is competent for the Federal government to adopt at last the principle that should have been adopted in these matters over forty years ago; the principle of "No Compromise." The government that compromises with crime gives it license and encouragement, and reveals itself as a weak and contemptible thing unfit for confidence.

This is civil war. We would better recognize it now than tell ourselves futile fibs about it while the internal enemy arms and develops plans, under revolutionary leadership, for the overthrow of the government. It is a comparatively simple matter to deal with now—but it is not going to be simple many years longer. It grows worse, and lately with accelerated pace. The West Virginia rebellion manifested itself mainly in sniping. This comes out in the open, like an "army with banners." They shot and clubbed to death men that had surrendered and had run up a white flag. Said one desperately wounded victim:

It won't be hard to prosecute the guilty. I believe nine out of ten miners in the district were in that mob. And there were a lot of women and children, too. The women showed no mercy. They just laughed and jeered when we asked not to be killed. My God! And they call this a free country!

It is said that some of these women held up their children to look upon the mutilated faces of the dead, and told them to "see what a good job daddy did."

It was too much blood for the stomach even of Hearst's hired man, Arthur Brisbane, who said of this horrible act:

That's bad news for union labor. It is playing the game of those that want to destroy all unions far better than they could play it for themselves. Murder leads to nothing definite except trouble for the murderers, and every man should know it.

And Brisbane ought to know. He has been for more than twenty-five years one of the doctors of philosophy of the college of discontent with the existing social order, with the chair of his democratic professorship in Delmonico's restaurant. But—there is no hedging by him this time, no chance of it; no talk of "strike sympathizers," no excuses, no socialistic humbug in his column to the effect that this is the work of agents provocateurs, or trouble makers hired by the coal barons to bring the honest union miners into disrepute. There were thousands of them, with the women whose hearts of mercy they had poisoned, and the children they had taught to admire murder and who in all likelihood will grow up murderers: a fine social element in the national life. How Lenin, when he hears of it, will applaud! It is just his dish.

The scenes are the scene of the German war, reenacted in America, land of justice and the free. A dispatch to the Chronicle says that one fugitive who reached Chicago with eight buckshot in his back overheard the leader of the mob cursing the others for permitting any one to escape to tell the tale. From another, who was lined up and marched out of town, this account was obtained:

The others were drawn up in front of a barbed-wire fence and told if they could clamber over it they might go free. As they mounted the fence all were shot, falling upon the barbed wire. Their murderers continued shooting into the bodies until they were perfectly limp. Meanwhile the lodge brother had called Bernard to one side, put him in a flivver, and drove him away, while the rest of the gang were finishing up the men on the fence.

"Most of the murderers were foreigners," said Bernard. "I saw very few white men among them. The women, too, all appeared to be dark-skinned foreigners, and they were more savage than the men, if that is possible. These hags were everywhere, screaming and urging their men to torture their victims before killing them.

"I left three of my buddies hanging on the fence, and twelve of them were shot down before they could reach the fence. While I was concealed in some dense shrubbery I saw about twenty miners searching through the woods for refugees. They were all foreigners, talking in a foreign language, but I could make out the word 'scab.' I looked across the prairie in front of me, and I could see men being 'pegged' from the woods on each side of the open space. I saw at least seven men shot down in that space.

"I followed through the woods to the north and came upon three men hanging from a tree. Their bodies were riddled with bullets and their faces were mashed and cut until they were just masses of bloody bones and flesh. In another small clump of woods I saw three more men hanging, all terribly mutilated. An elderly man named Schelpert, who saved me because we were both 'Bills,' guided me through the woods, and although we met parties of gunmen, they did not molest us, because I was under Schelpert's care. He finally conducted me to a water tank, and I got on the rods of a freight train that stopped there, reached St. Louis, and from there came home. It was hell."

Forty-four prisoners who surrendered under a flag of truce were being marched into Herrin. In a clump of woods, so says a dispatch to the Examiner, they were mowed down by a crash of rifle fire. One victim was hanged. For what crime? For the crime of working. "Let's make soap of them," said a young woman among the strikers.

Said John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, in a message to an Illinois politician just before the massacre:

Representatives of our organization are justified in treating this crowd as an outlaw organization and in viewing its members in the same light as they would any other common strike-breakers.

We shall do Lewis the justice to say that he probably did not intend that anybody should be murdered, much less that he meant to issue orders for murder to take place. But who is Lewis to pronounce sentence of outlawry, or say how anybody in this country shall be "treated"? He says the mine-owners incited the trouble. Old stuff.

This war has many causes, of which but a few of the general and fundamental are profitable to consider. It grows out of feeble government, government that is democratic, instead of representative as the Constitution intended the government of this country should be; government by a Congress largely composed of delegates, instead of a real House of Representatives acting on superior, centrally acquired information for the best interests of all their constituents and all constituencies. It grows out of the incessant criticism of courts of law by ignorant persons who have no knowledge of law and less of courts, and want the judges elected by the people and their decisions subject to "recall"; backed by such attacks on the Supreme Court as Senator La Follette made before the American Federation of Labor at Cincinnati the other day. It grows out of the spirit of ignorant discontent with common human troubles which will always have to be borne because they are by nature incurable. It grows out of the socialistic delusion that poverty is curable, but is somehow imposed on the rest of us by the rich so they can make more money out of human suffering. It grows out of the insane Karl Marx doctrine that the value of a product is its labor cost, and hence capital has been stolen from labor—a doctrine which, in all probability, the ordinary business man finds it hard to refute. It grows out of the usurped privilege and irresponsibility of labor unions, and out of popular attacks on the Supreme Court for pointing out that labor union responsibility is real. It grows out of the oratorical efforts of professional heart-bleeders, whose great hearts bleed for the poor in order to get votes on which they can become mob delegates in Congress; and who never do anything really beneficial for the poor after they get there. It grows out of political trimming; in the district attorneys' offices and the sheriffs' offices of the land. It grows out of general mental mush and sentimentality and pink Bolshevism in the universities. It grows out of the activities of circulation-hunting newspapers that hire literary rabble rousers to increase the advertising value of their columns—men who "can write just as well on either side of a subject"; such men are prostitutes. It grows out of the prattlings of ignorant persons about "social justice," when they know nothing whatever about justice, and very little about any real needs of society. And it grows out of the practice of ignoring the Malthusian principle, and bringing down wages to the suffering point by having families that are too large and adding unlimited importations of foreign labor.

One might cite causes indefinitely from the tendencies converging to this condition, but it would be useless at this time. We do not expect to see even the little matters we have mentioned corrected within the week. But this should be added: Burke said something to the effect that a government that could not protect the poorest Hindu on the banks of the Ganges could not be relied upon to protect an English castle on the banks of the Thames. Judged by that standard, the present government of Illinois appears to be almost wholly worthless.

The verdict of the coroner's jury is, of course, a tragic mockery and faithfully reflects the perversion of popular sentiment in the region affected. The first duty of government in the United States today is to suppress every form of private war, whether of striking miners in Illinois or striking taxicab drivers in San Francisco. No structure of "social justice" nor anything else of value can be built under conditions of anarchy.

German Tendencies

German monarchism has reared its ugly head once more, and with such manifestations of support as to indicate that what has recently been said of its strength by observant travelers is true and the German republic faces a growing danger. The assassination of Rathenau has not followed so closely in point of time upon that of Erzberger as to show that this is any transient flash of anger by a small group. The two acts are separated by an interval of nine months, which is sufficient "cooling time" for anybody, and manifests the duration of settled, persistent policy. In other words, this is no passing spasm, but the effect and demonstration of an organized reaction which appears to grow in popularity with every passing month.

The so-called psychology of the Germans, their direction of mind and feeling, their appraisal of political values, the object of their desires and ambitions in a political sense, seem to be things rooted in German character. Probably their origin is both historical and biological. Probably we should have reacted to their historical stimuli in a totally different manner. The fact remains that the average modern German in Germany is what he is, and that he is something radically and devilishly different from the Englishman or the American. He seems to worship power for power's sake, he seems to wish to build it up collectively, and to see it embodied in awful forms in his government and governmental institutions. He responds instantaneously to such suggestions on the part of his pedants and so-called philosophers. The state is his be-all and end-all, and having, perhaps, some practical difficulty in his comprehension of abstractions, although no one has more loudly claimed the mastery of abstract ideas, he wants to see it embodied in the person of a monarch to whose pomp he seems willing to surrender every atom of his individuality—social, industrial, and moral. He does not appear to want this power for any praiseworthy object, but merely for the power itself.

He is warlike, and always has been warlike, not for the defense of high ideals and individual happiness, but to see power manifested; and to his infantile mind its plainest, most easily comprehended manifestation is the destruction that war produces, with its accompaniment of terrible noises, always appealing to the savage—crashing bands, the boom of Big Berthas, rending explosions, the pulverizing of villages, cathedrals, and towns.

There is a fundamental, irreconcilable, hostility between such views of life and society and those through which the development of this country has progressed. We have been a nation of individualists. We have been jealous of the rights of persons against the encroachment of the state. We have instinctively recognized, almost throughout our history, that the greatest good to the greatest number, and the greatest good to all, did not need the meddling interference of government, did not need artificial promotion by either self-appointed or hereditary supermen, but was best wrought out through the cumulative effect of the activities of all the individuals of society, left free, as far as practically possible, to serve society by serving themselves. It is necessary that we recognize such a difference and that we understand that these two principles can not in any measure be mixed, in order to save ourselves from the drift toward the German governmental theory, which has recently set in.

The building up of collectivistic power in the government is a dream that dazzles the mind of the child, the visionary, the poet; or the theorist who stands on the side-lines and observes the effect of the labors of others without understanding those labors, or how those effects had to be brought about. We are daily drowned under waves of criticism of the management of industry, directed by visionaries against the only persons who can manage industry because they are the only persons who have survived the grueling contest for positions of management. This industrial survival of the fittest is a thing against which poets and dreamers instinctively rebel, because its incidents are selfish and unbeautiful; and under idealistic guidance we are in this country today building up great codes of meddling statutes and so-called regulations and multiplying tax-eating bureaus with commissioners to administer laws so intricate in their interferences with the intimate affairs of the people that they can not be made objective and general, but must be entrusted for enforcement to the discretion of a lot of little kings, each a despot in his own small field. The Southern Pacific and Central Pacific railroads are told that they must not be operated as a unit, and the individual under some idealistic scheme of city beautification is told that he must not have two families and two kitchens under the same roof. There are commissions in this state to control almost all the normal activities of life, and they are implacably hostile to the most valuable American customs. We are manifesting the beginnings of a distinctly German tendency toward the elimination of individualism and personal liberty, and unless we fight it in every future manifestation it will paralyze the best activities of our people and destroy a large measure of their well-being. For most of us are not Germans, and can not find our highest happiness in the German plan.

Decay.

Secretary Weeks' frank talk to the students at Western Reserve University on "The Decline of the American Government" has stirred up a hornets' nest at Washington, and is causing the esteemed Secretary of War to be criticized bitterly, not only by Democrats, but by many Republicans. The burden of the Republican criticism is, not that Secretary Weeks was in error, but that he chose an unpropitious time to utter the truth.

The politically informed know that Weeks was not in error, and that no time—from the standpoint of the public good—is ever unpropitious for telling the public what it ought to know. Can any one honestly declare that government, public service, politics, the American principles of self-government and self-reliance, have not been declining?

It is hardly debatable that the great body of the American people has a feeble understanding of the spirit in which this republic was founded than it had two generations ago, and that people are leaning with increasing weight on the government to do for them those things which they might better do for themselves. The tendency to establish a socialistic state continues—perhaps at a lesser rate of speed than four or five years ago, but still it continues. What is more, the results of that tendency are beginning to be observed in the behavior of the people.

A single local example will illustrate the case and make clear our meaning. One of the cities across the bay has a poet for managing director of its Chamber of Commerce. Sent East on a mission recently, he seized the opportunity of laying before the President of the United States a poetic scheme for having the youth of the land trained by the government instead of its parents or getting its training as the President got his, and as John Jacob Astor, Abraham Lincoln, Andrew Carnegie and everybody else in this country who was ever worth a cent got theirs. The government is to stand in loco parentis, we believe the phrase is, and the parents will stand—aside. Could anything be more poetic? Could anything be more obvious to the mind of a dreamer than the proposition that the present and historical system of bringing up children in this country is all wrong, a blunder worse than a crime? He says:

The purpose of the scheme is to train our coming citizens for peace—not for war. It will bring our great army of boys and young men together, will take them out of their provincialism, give them a certain amount of independence, and make better men of them.

If a wayfaring man may put such a question, how does he know it will? For the matter of that, how does any collectivistic, paternalistic visionary know what would be the result of his visions could they be realized? Why, you don't have to know it; it is enough to imagine it. Organize your bureaus on that basis and if the public ever finds out that the scheme is a failure it will be too late to correct it, for one more lot of bureaucrats will be entrenched in the treasury and ready to help their fellow-bureaucrats defend their positions with more force and effectiveness than a dozen Hellanmaria Dawses could ever overthrow. The "plan" has been submitted to Senator Shortridge and leading officials in the War Department, and is said to be on its way to Congress. And this is what is to be done to the glorious, self-reliant, impetuous and all-conquering youth of America, the youth of the Argonne and the Second Marne, if the thing can be made to work:

The youth will, soon after going into camp, be studied and examined, the purpose being to find out what he is fitted for and shape his training along that particular line. If a youth is interested in farming or stock raising, then he will be given special and practical training as a farmer. All kinds of vocational training will be provided, as well as training leading to the professions.

Special attention will be given to a development of the arts. Conservatories will be provided where talent in music and art will be brought out and developed.

Shades of Boone, Crockett, Carson and Jim Bridger, think of that! Think of Daniel Boone or Sergeant Alvin York pecking at the keys of a piano in a "conservatory"! Think of Charles M. Schwab or Charles C. Moore brought up by a government bureau, like a rubber plant!

Nations do not make men—men make nations. But the life of this nation tends, under increasing paternalistic influences, to descend to that dull and stodgy level which once was characteristic only of the older peoples of Europe. The spirit of adventure seems to have departed. Even on the new frontier of Alaska the change is apparent, and the secretary of an Alaskan Chamber of Commerce tells what some Alaskans believe the government should do for them and their territory, the nation's last frontier. According to him, the government must engage in colonizing, to put settlers on the land; it must provide low and money-losing transportation rates; it must build branch railroads; it must send geologists into the field to find the mineral hidden there and thus save the time and effort of the prospectors; it must survey and inventory and chart and define all of the potential wealth and resources of the territory and make them available for the pampered nephews of Uncle Sam to go and take them without individual effort or hardship.

Where would California, Oregon, and Washington be today if these had been the prevailing ideas at the time Americans moved into these states? They did not ask some one else to find for them the gold, the farms, or the cattle ranges. They took them.

The repressive hand of paternalistic government is responsible for the change. In the hearts of our young men the pioneer spirit is slumbering. It has been put to sleep by the narcotic of paternalism. The incentive to seek the bonanza in the wild places has been removed. The waste places, the undeveloped places, the unmapped regions are locked tight under this new scheme of Federal regulation. The seeker for the bonanza is warned away by the threat that if he finds it the government of the United States will claim it as the property of "all the people." The prospector has, largely, disappeared, not only from Alaska, but from the Western hills and mountains. A fanatical demand to "conserve resources for future generations" has gripped the government, and the country stagnates. In California the socialists offer us the social opium of the Water and Power Amendment. Standardized, level, and unimaginative people stir feebly and raise their voices to Washington in a plea "to come and help us and do the things that our forefathers were eager to do for themselves." It is manifested in the growing money aid the states are obtaining from the Federal government, and the dependence that course entails. The total of these paternal alms for the fiscal year 1921 reached the sum of $77,045,623.69. It has been estimated that in 1923, $170,000,000 will be made available for the coöperative construction of rural post roads alone.

And almost every day some new proposal is made to spend more Federal dollars where state dollars or privately-owned dollars should be spent. This truly marks a decline to lower political standards, unless the tendency shall be arrested by a general return of common sense and a general recognition of the value of individualism.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Dr. Barrows Explains.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Absence from Berkeley delayed my seeing your editorials in the issues of the Argonaut for May 27th and June 1st, discussing the situation of the University of California.

For the extreme kindness of these editorials to myself, I am profoundly grateful. As to the proper aims of the university, there may be little difference of opinion between us. No one here would, I think, express content with the standards of present-day scholarship. Low public tastes have penetrated academic campuses. Nevertheless, your indictment of the university seems to me very severe and to disregard the fine devotion and wholesome behavior which appear to me to predominate.

In recent years the university has received new functions and responsibilities. I know there are many who sympathize with the point of view of the Argonaut, that the university has lent itself too far to the undertaking of diverse and extra campus endeavors; but opposed to this conservative position is a large and influential body of opinion in the state which feels that the university should be a general servant in all matters pertaining to higher instruction and investigation. This feeling has operated, together with the great and justified confidence in the governing body of the university, in multiplying tasks which, in numerous instances, have not been sought by either regents or faculty, but which have been accepted in a sense of loyalty to the needs of the state as a whole.

The object of my writing, however, is primarily to correct a misapprehension upon which part of your editorial comment is based, and upon which candor hardly permits me to be silent. I refer to the relations between the academic senate and the president, and to the imputation that the regents have failed to support the president in differences with the senate. I assure you that on this matter there is misapprehension. On matters of general policy there have been few differences between the senate and the president; and in the happily few instances in which the president has recommended contrary to the prevailing opinion of the senate, the regents have invariably sustained the president's recommendation.

Some two and a half years ago, after thorough discussion between the regents and the academic senate, new standing rules were adopted by the regents with respect to the senate's position. These rules do not appear to alter fundamentally the position of the president. In an institution so varied and weighted with human problems, there must be somewhere power of prompt decision. That power still remains with the president. The rules, however, required that before decision he listen to the counsel of the senate. And considering the general advantages of consultation and the importance of the president's decision to the work of so many colleagues, consultation does not seem to be more than what such a body as the academic senate has a right to expect.

The changes of two and three years ago could not be made without some disturbance of university administration. A perfect adjustment, it must be admitted, has not been secured; but I venture to assert that distinct progress in the internal conduct of the university is being made. The relations between the senate and the president have not been inharmoniously broken. The president has not found it necessary to appeal to the regents in support of his authority, and consequently the regents have not failed with respect to the senate in giving him proper support.

I am not resigning the office of president because I despair of a right solution of the university's problems, nor of a proper administration of them, but for a reason which my letter of retirement exactly and comprehensively states, namely, my preference for plans feasible to a professor, but impracticable to a university executive, and my belief that as a professor I can be more successful and more serviceable.

Faithfully yours,

DAVID P. BARROWS.

Welcome Bill, Welcome Word.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 22, 1922.

The Argonaut, 207 Powell St.,

San Francisco, California—

GENTLEMEN: Many bills are placed before me daily. Some give me a jolt, some I am compelled to pay under protest, but there is no bill which it gives me greater pleasure to pay than my annual subscription to the Argonaut, which, in my humble opinion, is the best weekly published.

Here is hoping that all your old subscribers will renew their subscriptions with as much pleasure as I do mine and that Mr. Holman may live long enough to have at least one million subscribers to your wonderful paper.

Very truly yours,

JOSEPH DUNEY.

"SUCCESS" IN ONTARIO.

Statement of Premier Drury on Political Construction and Operation.

Non-Partisan Leaguers, organizations of office-holders, and other advocates of the social revolution involved in the Water and Power Amendment, are persistent in the claim that the Ontario governmental adventure in hydro-electric power production is a success—word of many meanings to many men. They are careful never to reveal the fact that at the end of the fiscal year 1920 the total construction achievement of the hydro-electric power commission (the water and power board of the province) amounted to but 23 per cent. of the plant capacity operated, and that in the main it is merely carrying on, how well no man knows, what private enterprise had economically conceived and built. The real test of success or failure is the ability of such a government agency to carry out new construction economically and effectively. If it can not do that we may be sure that the old plant is running down, too—that the political board lacks the ability to carry on with what business men created. The Russian debacle proves it.

Now, two big constructive undertakings of the Ontario hydro-electric power commission since it took hold of the industry eleven or twelve years ago are embodied in the Chippawa project and the Nipigon project. We have heretofore quoted in these columns, but quite briefly, the statement of the premier of Ontario, the Hon. E. C. Drury, himself a "public ownership man" and head of the present farmers' administration of the province, to the effect that the estimates for the Chippawa project grew, under political management, from $10,500,000 to $65,000,000 (indicating that political management manages well, for the politicians), and that under the Nipigon project the rates charged consumers of power, who were promised it at cost and probably received it at cost, grew from $15 a horsepower year, the charge of the private company previously operating in that field, to $21 a horsepower after the politicians got going. Which supports our previous statement that when the politicians sell power at cost it will cost like sin. At the Commonwealth Club dinner last week, where after exhaustive debate the Water and Power Amendment received from those club members present seven votes in favor to 101 against, it was insistently represented by socialistic advocates of the proposal that the Ontario project had been a great success, and that in the light of that success California ought to go valorously forward along the Russian road to the socialization of industry. It certainly does not support the myth of "success" for the premier of the province to say: "We must for the safety of hydro-electric development in Ontario get some sort of an organization which will not lead us to live from year to year in a fool's paradise, but will tell us the exact truth in regard to projected public undertakings of this nature. I take it that that is necessary if we are to save hydro-electric development in Ontario." No, that does not make a noise like success. It sounds like something else. There has been so much effort to begot the Ontario situation, and this phase of the discussion has now become so important, that we present Premier Drury's address in full. This is what he said, stenographically reported, to the Federation of Business Men's Associations at Toronto on March 17th last:

"I do not know how much the Chippawa development is going to cost. Nobody knows that. It may be money well spent, but the thing which the province must have in a public service commission on whose guidance and recommendations we undertake the expenditure of great sums of public money, is estimates upon which we can depend. If we get into the habit of taking estimates that can not be borne out, we are running into danger. I do not know that Chippawa is costing one cent more than it ought to cost, but I do know that the province has been told that it would cost much less than it is going to cost. Do you get my point?"

"If we are going to have the proper sort of guidance, we must be told in advance as nearly as possible what these great public ventures will cost, so that we can know whether they should be gone into or not."

"The history of the Chippawa development is this: On June 23, 1915, the chief engineer of the hydro-electric commission submitted a preliminary estimate covering the development of 100,000 horsepower at the Queenston site, and ultimate development of 300,000 horsepower, and said:

"We have estimated that the completion of the above works will cost $10,500,000, or an estimated cost per horsepower of $105, for 100,000 horsepower. The estimated annual charge on the above expenditure amounts to $944,600, or $9.44 per horsepower. This capital expenditure includes, in addition to that required for 100,000 horsepower development, the necessary equipment in the power house and headworks for an extension to 300,000 horsepower. The approximate cost for 200,000 horsepower will be in the neighborhood of $70 per horsepower with an annual charge of not less than $8."

"As regards the expenditures on account of the above comsidered development, I may say that these would be about $750,000 to $1,000,000 for the fiscal year ending October 31, 1916; approximately $3,000,000 during the fiscal year 1917; $5,000,000 during the year 1918, and the remainder in 1919.

"That was the original proposition for this work, to be completed in 1919.

"We have been told that the cost of Chippawa was due to its being a war undertaking. Well, it would have been if it had been carried out according to schedule; but not one-tenth of the present cost was spent during war-time. The war was over before the thing was seriously undertaken. It may have been planned as a war-time enterprise, but it was not conducted as a war-time enterprise, for the simple reason that the war had ceased before the work was seriously gone on with or much money spent on it.

"In 1918 the proposal to develop 275,000 horsepower had risen to 450,000, and the ultimate cost of developing 450,000 horsepower was given as $40,000,000. In 1920 fears began to be felt and an engineer named Cooper was called in to make a report, and Mr. Cooper made a report. Mr. Cooper intimated in his report that the cost for 275,000 horsepower would be a little over $65,000,000. Mr. Cooper's report has been vindicated almost to a cent. But what happened? The commission held that Mr. Cooper's report was not reliable. The commission sent for other engineers. The commission placed the facts of the construction up to date before the other engineers. Messrs. Stuart and Kerbaugh made an estimate, not of $65,000,000, but of $49,000,000. The government was asked to come over for a consultation. I, myself, with Colonel Carmichael, went to Niagara Falls, and we believed, on the word of the commission, that the Cooper estimate could not be relied upon.

"At the last session the hydro-electric commission submitted an estimate of $55,000,000, some $5,000,000 more than the estimated cost by Messrs. Stuart and Kerbaugh for the completion of the canal, with five generating units installed.

"Last year it became apparent that that cost was going to be vastly exceeded, and the government became alarmed and took the matter up with the commission; and what was the explanation? That the cost of cement and labor had gone up. In the public works department of the government they had gone down. We were told also that the steam shovels did not work; that the haste programme accounted for far more money than was expected. That was rendered a little hard to believe on account of the fact that the haste programme had been abandoned away back in July, and, instead of developing power in September, we did not develop it until the New Year. We are inquiring, and we have inquired, and we intend to inquire further.

"As I have said, we do not know whether Chippawa has cost too much. I do not know whether that work has not been done as efficiently and economically as it could be done; but, if it has, the public has not received the proper information as to the estimated cost. One can not get away from one or the other view; and the government intends, and we must for the safety of hydro-electric development in Ontario, get some sort of an organization which will not lead us to live from year to year in a fool's paradise, but will tell us the exact truth in regard to projected public undertakings of this nature. I take it that that is necessary, if we are to save hydro-electric development in Ontario.

"No business man among you would tolerate for a moment estimates such as I have quoted to you, going up without any justification, and with all the suspicion behind it that they are intended to induce the public to take up a project which otherwise they might be chary about taking up. That is not the right sort of business.

"I believe in public ownership and I believe in the success of public ownership, but I believe that that success can only be obtained by the public knowing, by the province knowing, the cost of the works which are to be undertaken with at least a fair degree of accuracy; and that we must have. We intend to find out why we have not had it. That is a position which the government must take in the defense of public ownership in the province of Ontario.

"Unfortunately, we have another development work which is an example of almost the same sort of thing. Up in the northwest section of the province there is a great public ownership development, the Nipigon development.

"The people of Fort William and Port Arthur undertook this development. They were definitely promised cheaper power. The work was gone on with and was to cost between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000. It has already cost for a partial development $6,300,000. That is what comes from underestimating. The people of Port Arthur and Fort William were given rosy figures. They voted for cheaper power; no man votes for dearer power; but because the work was underestimated they are getting dearer power; and they are sore about it, and do you wonder that they are sore about it? Again, it was not a business undertaking.

"I am not saying that the Nipigon development may not be wise, but I am saying that the people of those two cities responsible for it should have been given an estimate somewhere about what it would have cost to go into it, and then have been allowed to use their own judgment.

"Last year there was piled up a loss which must be added to capital, a loss of about $300,000; and the people of Port Arthur are paying about $21 a horsepower for power at cost, instead of some $15 per horsepower under private ownership. Under these public ownership developments you can not look too far into the future. You can not build a work that is to supply power ten years hence. Under the scheme of 'power at cost' the capital cost must bear the interest charge until consumption overtakes it. In Port Arthur the interest charge is not half met by the cost of the power sold. The remainder of the interest charge is added to the capital account; so that each year, without a bit of work being done upon the development, the capital cost mounts up by about $300,000. It is the old scheme. I believe in private promotions it is described as the policy of making the dog eat his tail until he gets something else to feed upon. It is probably a sound method and it is certainly the only way in which these charges can be met, unless the province as a whole is to absorb the loss. But, Mr. Chairman, if the dog has to feed upon himself until he has not only eaten his tail, but also half of his body, he becomes a comparatively worthless dog; and that is exactly what we fear of such schemes as the Nipigon power project, built ahead of the requirements of its power market. It is the thing which may become apparent at Chippawa if we do not handle it wisely. We must handle it as wisely as we can—otherwise it may become a burden to the people of Ontario instead of a benefit to the people of the province. That is why the government has been stepping in and making inquiries."

OLD FAVORITES.

The Lass of the Halfpenny Hatch.

While some are admird,
For charms bought or hired:
With neither pride, paint, or patch,
More charming by far
Than all of them are
Is the lass of the Halfpenny Hatch.

So neat, although plain,
So graceful her mien,
Although she lives under the thatch;
Though the linen be coarse,
The skin's ne'er the worse,
Of the lass of the Halfpenny Hatch.

What though she can't boast,
Like many a gay toast,
Of her jewels, her trinkets, her watch;
Such toys she may scorn,
For they could not adorn
The lass of the Halfpenny Hatch.

Her every action
Drives me to distraction;
To see her but lift up the latch
Sets my heart all on fire,
And all I desire
Is the lass of the Halfpenny Hatch.

Oh! were she out kind,
And like me inclin'd,
I'd the first opportunity catch
A flame to impart,
Like mine, to the heart
Of the lass of the Halfpenny Hatch.

In some happy time,
When our love's in the prime,
If one willing kiss I could snatch,
I'd envy no peer
His lady less fair
Than the lass of the Halfpenny Hatch.

Of dames, or of misses,
Where's one such as this is?
In short, there's not one that can match,
In Surry, fair shire,
Nor on earth far or near,
With the lass of the Halfpenny Hatch.

—Old London Song, dated 1757.

Vanity Fair.

"Vanitas vanitatum" has rung in the ears
Of gentle and simple for thousand of years;
The wail still is heard, yet its notes never scarce
Either simple or gentle from Vanity Fair.

I often hear people abusing it, yet
There the young go to learn and the old to forget;
The mirth may be feigning, the sheen may be glare,
But the gingerbread's gilded in Vanity Fair.

Old Dives there rolls in his chariot, but mind
Atra Cura is up with the lacqueys behind;
Joan trudges with Jack—are the Sweethearts aware
Of the trouble that waits them in Vanity Fair?

We saw them all go, and we something may learn
Of the harvest they reap when we see them return.
The tree was enticing; its branches are bare—Heigho for the promise of Vanity Fair.

That stupid old Dives, once honest enough,
His honesty sold for star, ribbon, and stuff;
And Joan's pretty face has been clouded with care
Since Jack bought her ribbons at Vanity Fair.

Contemtable Dives! Too credulous Joan!
Yet we all have a Vanity Fair of our own;
My son, you have yours, but you need not despair—
I own I've a weakness for Vanity Fair.

Philosophy halts—wise counsels are vain,
We go, we repent, we return there again;
Tonight you will certainly meet with us there—
So come and be merry in Vanity Fair.

—Frederick Locker-Lampson.

A writer in the North American says: "Millions of unbuilt houses proclaim that 'the very stones cry out.'" How the mischief can an unbuilt house proclaim anything?

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Dr. Stephen Smith, centenarian, and Columbia's oldest alumnus, was made a Doctor of Science at the university's 168th commencement.

Howard Chandler Christy recently completed a portrait of President Harding after five consecutive Sunday afternoon sittings at the White House. Mr. Christy is also an Ohioan.

Glenna Collett is the infant phenomenon of the golf world. Though only nineteen, she has already won scores of important golf titles. Miss Collett, who is from Providence, Rhode Island, recently won the Eastern golf championship for women.

Rosie Reeve of Chicago, the eleven-year-old prodigy, is to enter Columbia Law School in the fall. Miss Reeve has been exempt from most of the grammar grades and from the entire high school course, and has already been in residence one college semester.

Cornelius Cole, former United States senator from California, is the last surviving member of the Senate that tried Andrew Johnson for impeachment in 1868. Senator Cole, who was born in New York State in 1822 and moved to California in 1849, will be one hundred years old in September.

Miss Charlotte Sharman, at the age of ninety, still actively manages the home for girl orphans she established in Southwork, London, some sixty years ago. Miss Sharman is far from old-fashioned. She personally types all her own letters and participates in the instruction of her two hundred wards.

Among the forty-two commoners honored by the King of England's birthday list was Henry Fielding Dickens, sixth son of Charles Dickens, the novelist. Mr. Dickens is a lawyer. He has been king's counsel since 1892; bencher of the Inner Temple since 1899; and common sergeant of the City of London since 1918. His recent promotion was to the knighthood and he is therefore now Sir Henry Dickens. Sir Henry is noted as an amateur fencer and as a mathematician.

Alfred E. Zimmern, author of "Europe in Convalescence" and recognized authority on the European muddle, is Wilson professor of international politics at the University College in Aberystwyth, Wales. Professor Zimmern was educated at New College, Oxford, where he became a lecturer in ancient history and later a fellow and tutor. It is interesting to note that he is the translator of Ferrero's "Greatness and Decline of Rome." He is author of many war-time essays.

Booth Tarkington has again demonstrated his championship in American literature by winning for the second time the Pulitzer Prize, which is awarded annually "for the American novel published during the year which best represents the wholesome atmosphere of American life and the higher standards of American manners and manhood." His "Magnificent Ambersons" was awarded the prize for 1918 and "Alice Adams" was chosen for 1921. Mr. Tarkington, as is to be expected, is a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters. It is not so generally known that he was a member of the Indiana house of representatives, 1902-03.

Other winners of the Pulitzer awards are as follows. Hamlin Garland won the $1000 prize for the best biography of the year with his "A Daughter of the Middle Border." Eugene O'Neill was awarded the same sum for his play, "Anna Christie." Kirk L. Simpson, who will be remembered as the Associated Press reporter who wrote the story of the burial of the unknown soldier at Arlington Cemetery last November, was awarded the thousand-dollar Pulitzer Prize for journalism. The prize for the best cartoon of the year was taken by Rollin Kirby for his "On the Road to Moscow," published in the New York World.

Julius Howland Barnes, recently elected president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, is also president of the Barnes-Ames Company, wheat exporters, of the McDougall-Duluth Company and the Klearfax Linen Rug Company. He was president of the United States Food Administration Grain Corporation from August, 1917, to July, 1919, and he has been president of the United States Grain Corporation since the latter date. He was made a commander of the Order of the Crown of Belgium in 1919 and an officer of the French Legion of Honor in the same year. Mr. Barnes was born in Little Rock, Arkansas, and is forty-nine years old.

Philip H. Kerr, formerly private secretary to Lloyd George, is visiting this country for a rest from his recent strenuous labors. After his retirement from the post of the British premier's secretary last summer he worked for several months with the editorial forces of the London Daily Chronicle. Mr. Kerr is the son of the late Major-General Lord Ralph Kerr, and is the cousin and heir presumptive of the tenth Marquis of Lothian, one of whose estates, Blickling Hall in the County of Norfolk, was the birthplace of Anne Boleyn, the mother of Queen Elizabeth. Mr. Kerr was the editor of the State, South Africa, 1908-09, and was an associate of Lord Astor on the Round Table from 1910 to 1916. He was formerly assistant secretary of the Intercolonial Council of the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony, and of the railway committee of the Central South African Railway.

THE HUMORIST ABROAD.

Stephen Leacock Lectures On English Idiosyncracies and a Few of Our Own.

How the great American fallacy concerning British humor has existed since Mr. Leacock's first books were published and became best sellers is something of a mystery. It is pleasant to know that our national error can not possibly outlive the first edition of "My Discovery of England." For, not only is Mr. Leacock himself a living contradiction to the perverse Yankee notion that the British are humorless; he also conducts an expedition into the supposedly fabled region of English humor and veritably discovers it for America. If it were not for the fortunate migration of the elder Leacocks to Canada when Stephen was aged eight we—that is the United States—might still be under the vain delusion that the cult of the funny, like Christian Science and the Standard Oil, was a domestic product. Of course a few fortunate of us would have been enlightened. But American readers of Sir Owen Seaman's paper are not so numerous as the same class of Mr. Leacock's readers. This is because—let us admit the truth—it was not at first recognized that Mr. Leacock was not American. His nonsense was so delightful, his fun so contagious, that, after the hospitable American custom of hailing celebrities, we clasped him to the national bosom and claimed him for our own. Mr. Leacock—we should interpolate here—has concurred. He calls himself an American, and it is not our fault that with that term he recognizes the continent and not the United States of America. And probably, as is the case with a man who lives in one city and works in another, feeling himself rather a citizen of the latter, Mr. Leacock's royalties do make him feel at home this side of the St. Lawrence. Far be it from us, at any rate, to disown him.

It was with a truly American reaction that the Canadian humorist set out "to restore the balance of trade" in international exchanges of lecturers. He decided that it was high time something was done about it and he did it. And he maintains that it was with an equally American shock of surprise that he landed in England. For the first time we are really getting some insight into our national differentiation:

But bad as is the conduct of the English customs men, the immigration officials are even worse. I could not help being struck by the dreadful carelessness with which people are admitted into England. There are, it is true, a group of officials said to be in charge of immigration, but they know nothing of the discriminating care exercised on the other side of the Atlantic.

"Do you want to know," I asked one of them, "whether I am a polygamist?"

"No, sir," he said very quietly.

"Would you like me to tell you whether I am fundamentally opposed to any and every system of government?"

The man seemed mystified. "No, sir," he said. "I don't know that I would."

"Don't you care?" I asked.

"Well, not particularly, sir," he answered.

I was determined to arouse him from his lethargy.

"Let me tell you, then," I said, "that I am an anarchistic polygamist, that I am opposed to all forms of government, that I object to any kind of revealed religion, that I regard the state and property and marriage as the mere tyranny of the bourgeoisie, and that I want to see class hatred carried to the point where it forces every one into brotherly love. Now, do I get in?"

The official looked puzzled for a minute. "You are not Irish, are you, sir?" he said.

"No."

"Then I think you can come in all right," he answered.

And if official England was different from Cist-Atlantic institutions traditional England was even more so:

But what I deplore still more, and I think with reason, is the total omission of the familiar interrogation: "What is your impression of our women?"

That's where the reporter over on our side hits the nail every time. That is the point at which we always nudge him in the ribs and buy him a cigar, and at which youth and age join in a sly jest together. Here again the sub-heading comes in so nicely: THINKS YOUNGSTOWN WOMEN CHARMING. And they are. They are, everywhere. But I hate to think that I had to keep my impression of London women unused in my pocket while a young man asked me whether I thought modern literature owed more to observation and less to inspiration than some other kind of literature.

Now that's exactly the kind of question, the last one, that the London reporters seem to harp on. They seemed hipped about literature; and their questions are too difficult. One asked me whether the American drama was structurally inferior to the French. I don't call that fair. I told him I didn't know; that I used to know the answer to it when I was at college, but that I had forgotten it, and that, anyway, I am too well off now to need to remember it.

That question is only one of a long list that they asked me about art and literature. I missed nearly all of them, except one as to whether I thought Al Jolson or Frank Tinney was the higher artist, and even that one was asked by an American who is wasting himself on the London press.

As the London newspaper men failed so signally to encourage Mr. Leacock to talk, and particularly to give out his impressions, for which he had expressly made the journey to England, he was obliged to devote a chapter of his chronicle simply to enumerating the aforesaid impressions. Here are some of them:

London, the name of which is already known to millions of readers of this book, is beautifully situated on the river Thames, which here sweeps in a wide curve with much the same breadth and majesty as the St. Jo River at South Bend, Indiana. London, like South Bend itself, is a city of clean streets and admirable sidewalks, and has an excellent water supply. One is at once struck by the number of excellent and well-appointed motor cars that one sees on every hand, the neatness of the shops and the cleanliness and cheerfulness of the faces of the people.

Mr. Leacock admits that both in the foregoing and the following paragraph of "impressions" he is largely influenced by the current school of impression mongers. In fact he confesses that though indebted to them for their example he can not quite come up to the ease with which they can produce impressions of a strange country five minutes after docking or passing its frontier. Here is another attempt on the part of Mr. Leacock to adjust the international balance in these matters:

No description of London would be complete without a reference, however brief, to the singular salubrity and charm of the London climate. This is seen at its best during the autumn and winter months. The climate of London and indeed of England generally is due to the influence of the Gulf Stream. The way it works is thus: The Gulf Stream, as it nears the shores of the British Isles and feels the proximity of Ireland, rises into the air, turns into soup, and comes down on London. At times the soup is thin and is in fact little more than a mist: at other times it has the consistency of a thick Potage St. Germain. London people are a little sensitive on the point and flatter their atmosphere by calling it a fog; but it is not: it is soup. The notion that no sunlight ever gets through and that in the London winter people never see the sun is of course a ridiculous error, circulated no doubt by the jealousy of foreign nations. I have myself seen the sun plainly visible in London, without the aid of glasses, and on a November day in broad daylight; and again one night about 4 o'clock in the afternoon I saw the sun distinctly appear through the clouds.

Naturally, as a political economist, the Canadian humorist-professor was deeply interested in English politics. And of course he lost no time in making a survey of the houses of Parliament. The House of Lords he decided was easily disposed of. They meet somewhere in the Parliament buildings, come together very quietly shortly before the dinner hour, enjoy a biscuit and a dry sherry at the government's expense, reject all bills before them at the moment and adjourn for two years. However, Mr. Leacock says it is an erroneous idea that the House of Commons is equally unimportant. He is inclined to take the House of Commons quite seriously, while confessing that he does not always understand its inner politics:

The members can apparently ask any questions they like. In the repeated visits which I made to the gallery of the House of Commons I was unable to find any particular sense or meaning in the questions asked, though no doubt they had an intimate bearing on English politics not clear to an outsider like myself. I heard one member ask the government whether they were aware that herrings were being imported from Hamburg to Harwich. The government said no. Another member rose and asked the government whether they considered Shakespeare or Molière the greater dramatic artist. The government answered that ministers were taking this under their earnest consideration and that a report would be submitted to Parliament. Another member asked the government if they knew who won the Queen's Plate this season at Toronto. They did—in fact this member got in wrong, as this is the very thing that the government do know. Towards the close of the evening a member rose and asked the government if they knew what time it was. The Speaker, however, ruled this question out of order on the ground that it had been answered before.

Still on the subject of the government our international interpreter discovers that England has been sadly corrupted by American politics. Whole classes of society, Mr. Leacock records, are hopelessly damaged by American corruption. Once English politics were pure; they are no longer. Doubtless the Conference is to blame. There are still a few remote parts of the United Kingdom unaffected. Like Mr. Hewlett, Mr. Leacock thinks that the hope of the future lies with the peasantry:

There are, it is true, a few classes that have escaped this contagion, shepherds living in the hills, drovers, sailors, fishermen and such like. I remember the first time I went into the English country-side being struck with the clean, honest look in the people's faces. I realized exactly where they got it: they had never seen any Americans. I remember speaking to an aged peasant down in Somerset. "Have you ever seen any Americans?" "Nah," he said, "uz eard a mowt o' em' zir, but uz zeen nowt o' 'em." It was clear that the noble fellow was quite undamaged by American contact.

But to return to the engrossing subject of politics and its decline in England, due to the insidious influence of American graft:

The inner history of the conference is only just beginning to be known. But it is whispered that immediately on his arrival Mr. Balfour was given a cigar by President Harding. Mr. Balfour at once offered to scrap five ships, and invited the entire American cabinet into the British Embassy, where Sir A. Geddes was rash enough to offer them champagne.

The American delegates immediately offered to scrap ten ships. Mr. Balfour, who simply can not be outdone in international courtesy, saw the ten and raised it to twenty. President Harding saw the twenty, raised it to thirty, and sent out for more poker chips.

At the close of the play Lord Beatty, who is urbanity itself, offered to scrap Portsmouth Dockyard, and asked if anybody present would like Canada. President Harding replied with his customary tact that if England wanted the Philippines, he would think it what he would term a residuum of normalcy to give them away. There is no telling what might have happened had not Mr. Briand interposed to say that any transfer of the Philippines must be regarded as a signal for a 20 per cent. increase in the Boy Scouts of France. As a tactful conclusion to the matter President Harding raised Mr. Balfour to the peerage.

Having clarified English politics for us, Mr. Leacock next turns to the great institution of British education. Now, it is a noteworthy thing that a man, being a humorist and a professional humorist, can poke fun at almost everything in the universe and really succeed in maintaining the philosophic balance that only a humorist ever attains. But man is fallible. Evidently, if one search far enough in every humorist's output he will come upon one subject that the man of fun can not take dispassionately. With Mr. Leacock the subject is education. Dealing with that subject, his froth bubbles out. Beyond the superbly insouciant mask of the humorist one detects the serious features of a professor, and a serious professor at that. Of course he keeps up the nonsense idiom, as the following paragraph shows:

This is bad enough. But after all one might say this is only the mechanical side of education. True: but one searches in vain in the Oxford curriculum for any adequate recognition of the higher and more cultured studies. Strange though it seems to us on this side of the Atlantic, there are no courses at Oxford in Housekeeping, or in Salesmanship, or in Advertising, or on Comparative Religion, or on the influence of the Press. There are no lectures whatever on Human Behaviour, on Altruism, on Egotism, or on the Play of Wild Animals. Apparently, the Oxford student does not learn these things. This cut him off from a great deal of the larger culture of our side of the Atlantic.

But if you doubt the validity of the foregoing criticism, read "Oxford As I See It" (Mr. Leacock's chapter on education) before reading any of the rest of the book. Then turn to the opening pages and be jolted from honest-to-goodness seriousness to the sheerest Leacockian nonsense. It is an interesting experiment in psychology.

Prohibition naturally comes into its share of searching analysis. Mr. Leacock shrewdly observes that prohibition is on the way in England. Not so, however, in bonny Scotland. There you may still drink both legally and respectfully:

I find that, classified altogether, there are seventeen reasons advanced in Scotland for taking whisky. They run as follows: Reason one, because it is raining; Two, because it is not raining; Three, because you are just going out into the weather; Four, because you have just come in from the weather; Five,—no, I forget the ones that come after that. But I remember that reason number seventeen is "because, it canna do ye any harm." On the whole, reason seventeen is the best.

Put in other words this means that the Scotch make use of whisky with dignity and without shame; and they never call it alcohol.

Along with his analysis of English humor and our inappreciation of it, our author makes a discovery about the Scottish funny-bone and about the psychology of humor generally. It is a very important discovery, so we quote at length:

"So you're going to try to take humor up to Scotland," the most eminent author in England said to me. "Well, the Lord help you. You'd better take an axe with you to open their skulls; there is no other way." How this legend started I don't know, but I think it is because the English are jealous of the Scotch. They got into the Union with them in 1707 and they can't get out. The Scotch don't want Home Rule, or Swa Raj, or Dominion status, or anything; they just want the English. When they want money they go to London and make it; if they want literary fame they sell their books to the English; and to prevent any kind of political trouble they take care to keep the Cabinet well filled with Scotchmen. The English for shame's sake can't get out of the Union, so they retaliate by saying that the Scotch have no sense of humor. But there's nothing in it. One has only to ask any of the theatrical people and they will tell you that the audiences in Glasgow and Edinburgh are the best in the British Isles—possess the best taste and the best ability to recognize what is really good.

The reason for this lies, I think, in the well-known fact that the Scotch are a truly educated people, not educated in the mere sense of having been made to go to school, but in the higher sense of having acquired an interest in books and a respect for learning. In England the higher classes alone possess this, the working class as a whole know nothing of it. But in Scotland the attitude is universal. And the more I reflect upon the subject, the more I believe that what counts most in the appreciation of humor is not nationality, but the degree of education enjoyed by the individual concerned. I do not think that there is any doubt that educated people possess a far wider range of humor than the uneducated class.

But the really great discovery that our intrepid explorer made concerns the habit of story-telling. British society is not so pervaded by it as ours. Hence the American notion that our friends across the pond lack a sense of humor:

As far as I am able to judge, English society is not pervaded and damaged by the story-telling habit as much as is society in the United States and Canada. On our side of the Atlantic story-telling at dinners and on every other social occasion has become a curse. In every phase of social and intellectual life one is haunted by the funny anecdote. Any one who has ever attended a Canadian or American banquet will recall the solemn way in which the chairman rises and says: "Gentlemen, it is to me a very great pleasure and a very great honor to preside at this annual dinner. There was an old ducky once—" and so forth. When he concludes he says, "I will now call upon the Rev. Dr. Stooze, Head of the Provincial University, to propose the toast 'Our Dominion.'" Dr. Stooze rises amid great applause and with great solemnity begins, "There was once two Irishmen—" and so on to the end. But in London, England, it is apparently not so. Not long ago I had the pleasure of meeting at dinner a member of the government. I fully anticipated that as a member of the government he would be expected to tell a funny story about an old ducky, just as he would on our side of the water. In fact, I should have supposed that he could hardly get into the government unless he did tell a funny story of some sort. But all through dinner the cabinet minister never said a word about either a Methodist minister, or a commercial traveler, or an old ducky, or two Irishmen, or any of the stock characters of the American repertory. On another occasion I dined with a bishop of the church. I expected that when the soup came he would say, "There was an old ducky—" After which I should have had to listen with rapt attention, and, when he had finished, without any pause, rejoin, "There were a couple of Irishmen once—" and so on. But the bishop never said a word of the sort.

In our opinion this is the long and the short of the whole matter, and Mr. Leacock deserves a vote of thanks and three cheers for running it to ground. For our own part—we relapse to our native interpretation. The English may lack a sense of humor, i. e., a mania for story-telling. But how restful it must be.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending June 24, 1922, were $129,100,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $118,500,000; an increase of $10,600,000.

"The prosperity of the United States depends largely upon the prosperity of our so-called public utilities," writes Floyd W. Parsons in the World's Work. "We can not be successful as a nation unless the corporations ance with hard-and-fast rules, and that nothing is more beneficial than the execution of some plan which will convert a large percentage of the customers into owners of the company's stock.

"The time has arrived when the public utilities and the people must get together. The utilities are the heaviest taxpayers in every populated section of the country. No community can develop faster than its public utilities. Therefore, regulation of these public-service corporations must be progressive and efficient rather than merely restrictive and corrective.

"The nation's public utilities not only render an essential service, but contribute their full share to the country's advancement, socially and industrially. If the utilities go back, the nation can not go ahead. We have come to a day when the obvious needs are fair play, mutual understanding, and all-round good will."

A merger of Pacific-Southwest banks, involving resources of approximately $200,000,000, headed by the First National Bank of Los Angeles, the Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank, and the First Securities Company, of which organizations Henry M. Robinson is president, becomes effective at the close of business June 30th.

The twenty-four cities containing banking institutions and banks affected in this merger are as follows:

Alhambra—Alhambra Savings and Commercial Bank.

Carpinteria—Branch of Commercial Trust and Savings Bank, Santa Barbara.

Catalina Island—Avalon Branch of Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank.

Fresno—Fidelity Trust and Savings Bank.

Glendale—Glendale Avenue Branch and Brand Boulevard Branch of the Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank.

Guadalupe—Branch of Bank of Santa Maria.

Hanford—The Farmers and Merchants National Bank and Hanford Savings Bank.

Hollywood—The First National Bank of Hollywood and Hollywood Savings Bank.

Huntington Beach—Branch of Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank.

Huntington Park—Branch of Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank.

Lindsay—Lindsay National Bank.

Lompoc—Branch of Commercial Trust and Savings Bank, Santa Barbara.

Long Beach—The City National Bank.

Los Alamos—Branch of Bank of Santa Maria.

Los Angeles—The First National Bank of Los Angeles, Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank (with twenty branches in the city of Los Angeles), and First Securities Company.

Orcutt—Branch of Bank of Santa Maria.

Oxnard—First National Bank and Oxnard Savings Bank.

Pasadena—Union Trust and Savings Branch of Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank.

Redlands—The First National Bank of Redlands and Savings Bank of Redlands.

San Pedro—Marine Branch of Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank.

Santa Barbara—Commercial Trust and Savings Bank.

Santa Maria—Bank of Santa Maria.

Tulare—National Bank of Tulare and Savings Bank of Tulare.

Visalia—First National Bank of Visalia and Producers Savings Bank.

Under the form of the merger, the stock of all of these institutions is pooled and beneficial certificates are issued to all present stockholders, giving to each a pro rata ownership in all of the merged institutions.

Following the merger plan, it is announced that all merged banks will operate under the name of the Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank, with the exception of the First National Bank of Hollywood. The latter will be taken directly into the First National Bank of Los Angeles and will operate as the the Hollywood agency of the First National Bank of Los Angeles.

In working out this consolidation no banks have been bought out. Each bank goes into the merger on an even basis of actual book value of its stock, and, as a result, it is stated that no one set of stockholders has benefited at the expense of others, the whole plan being based upon the setting up of an equitable partnership between the various banks merged—a partnership in which local officers and local boards of directors will still control local business. There will be no changes in the personnel of officers and employees in the various cities.

Following the merger, it is announced that the First Securities Company will parallel in the field of investment the banking service to be rendered throughout the Pacific-Southwest by the merged institutions.

The First Securities Company will furnish underwriting assistance to sound California enterprises of good management and proven earning power, and will recommend to investors good securities which have first been carefully investigated and are deemed worthy of investment by the banks' own funds.

In creating this merger no effort has been made to achieve "bigness." The plan has been to unify some of the best banks of the Pacific-Southwest occupying key positions in the various districts, in order that more complete financial assistance may be given the marketing of the various seasonal crops of the Southern California territory from Fresno south to the Mexican line, and to provide the necessary financial machinery for the upbuilding of this territory upon balanced lines.

It is announced that the merger has been the result of two years of careful investigation of the needs of the Pacific-Southwest. Particular attention in this investigation has been given to the working out of plans whereby the credit of the community may be equitably allocated to the various agricultural and business interests of the entire Pacific-Southwest.

By this merger money returned to the Pacific-Southwest in the spring from the sale of the orange crop of Southern California can be used for financing the raisin crop in the San Joaquin Valley. Money obtained in the fall from the marketing of raisins is available for the early vegetable grower of the Imperial Valley. Similarly, the diversity of seasonal movement of other products results in the elasticity of bank credits, and this elasticity in turn results in additional service to the various communities.

Henry M. Robinson, president of the First National Bank of Los Angeles, the Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank, and the First Securities Company—the man who brought this merger about and who will direct its operations—in outlining the policies to be pursued by the merged institutions, said:

"One of the results of the experience in the great war has been that people have come to know definitely that economies can be made and wastes eliminated by the merging of institutions in practically every line of endeavor, and it will be observed that this tendency is very strong in all parts of the world and in all lines. It is a form of co-operation on a definitely organized plan, in which a given activity in various communities is coordinated for the benefit of all of the communities. This particular merger contemplates the coordination of institutions within an economic area which constitutes a part of the great Pacific-Southwest, to the end that the institution's work will prove of general benefit throughout the area.

"The area in which this merged institution will carry on its activities directly is that part of California including Fresno and south to the Mexican boundary, and in this section the products, agricultural, mining, and manufacturing, are harvested and marketed in such seasons that it will make substantially a continuous use of credits and flatten the curve of peak demands to the minimum. This gives a more economic use and coordinates the funds within the area to the advantage of all concerned.

"It is a fallacy to think that size and 'bigness' are desirable ends. In a country producing as prolifically as this, and where nature is so kind, it should be the endeavor of all the producers to improve the quality of their products. The California cooperative associations, which are outstanding successes as compared with cooperative associations in other parts of the country, are committed to the policy of improvement in the quality of service. The immediate benefit runs to the more balanced industry, due to a broadening demand for basic commodities. Increased business is indicated in the constantly rising volume of bank clearings and in the statistics of greater production, says the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank in its June monthly letter. There is some gain in the number of new incorporations formed during the first five months of 1922 compared with the same months last year. On the other hand business leaders are disposed to act conservatively, bearing in mind the lessons learned during the critical period of post-war deflation, and no rapid expansion is to be looked for. Failures for the month of May were less in number and in total liabilities than any month since last September.

Mr. Parsons tells how the attitude of the public toward public utilities has changed and how also the attitude of public utility officials toward the public has changed.

Increased output of automobiles reflects a better state of affairs in that industry, the April increase being 35 per cent. over April, 1921. Increased building construction is giving the steel mills a greater tonnage, which, with larger railroad buying, accounts for the improved trend in this great industry.

New buying power is represented by orders from South American states and other foreign governments for the purchase of materials and merchandise in the United States. These purchases are being ultimately settled for in many instances with the proceeds of loans placed with American investors by the borrowing nations. With a decline in the premium for dollar credits, it has been possible for foreigners to buy here more advantageously than was the case a few months ago, when European exchange quotations were so low as greatly to increase the cost of financing purchases made in the United States. In this way the rise in foreign exchange rates has come to be an important factor, and in some quarters it is being freely predicted that London drafts may before long again touch the par of exchange, about 4.8665.

Through the 10 per cent. cut in freight rates the shipping public is expected to save about $250,000,000 a year from reduced delivery charges. The American Farm Bureau Federation estimates that the saving to the farmers alone will aggregate $127,000,000 a year. This, in addition to the previous cuts on farm products of $93,000,000 a year, will greatly relieve the farming situation and make it easier for producers to deal profitably with distant markets. With the new rates in effect next month, it is expected that a good deal of business will be released and the volume of freight traffic materially enlarged. The railroads, however, face a serious problem. The diminution of $250,000,000 in revenue resulting from the reduction of freight rates will be only partially offset by lessened operating expenses due to the wage cuts ordered by the Railroad Labor Board.

A $250,000 first closed mortgage 7 per cent. sinking fund bond issue of Austin Brothers Association is being offered by a syndicate headed by George H. Burr & Co. and E. H. Rollins & Sons at 98 and interest to yield over 7.25 per cent. In addition to constituting a first closed mortgage on more than 31,500 acres of land in Utah, Wyoming, Idaho and Nevada, appraised at twice the amount of the bonded debt, these bonds are the direct obligation and the only mortgaged indebtedness of Austin Brothers Association, whose total assets are in the ratio of $4400 for each $1000 bond.

Austin Brothers Association has been in business for over thirty-four years and owns at the present time, in addition to its land ownings, 26,000 head of sheep and 1000 head of cattle.

The most adequate idea of the growth of corporate enterprises in California may be gleaned from an examination of H. D. Walker's "Manual of California Securities and Directory of Directors." The edition, which is ready for distribution, is the fourteenth annual number of this valuable statistical publication, and, as has been invariably the case in recent years, the present volume is about sixty pages larger than its predecessor, which was issued last year at this time.

Not only has Walker covered the corporate statistics of this state, including recent organizations, more fully, but the present manual embraces a large quantity of new and original matter of unquestionable value to investors, brokers, banks and business men generally.

For example, the scope of the book has been expanded, so as to embrace the big new underwritings of the year in the Twelfth Federal Reserve District, and more especially in the states of Nevada, Washington, and Oregon.

Land bonds and other bonds, including the bonds of irrigation districts all in these, which were placed with investors by local firms during the past year, are fully enumerated and described.

This business of financing the corporate requirements of the neighboring states is bound to become an increasingly important feature in the future for California financial institutions, now that the ice has been broken and the corporations have learned that California is able to supply the money for meritorious enterprises.

T. C. Macdonald, 516 Bank of Italy Building, Oakland, is offering $100,000 Harwell Industries Company 8 per cent. cumulative participating preferred stock, participating up to 10 per cent., preferred as to both assets and earnings. Price, $10; par value, $10.

The company is organized to engage in the building of modern four and five-room homes to sell for from $3000 to $3500.

The company owns 381 building lots located at Twenty-Third and Market Streets, Richmond, California, which said building lots are improved with graded streets, sidewalks, sewers, electricity and electric transportation. A large modern school building located on the property. A Catholic church and a Baptist church within a few blocks. These 381 lots have been appraised at $350 per lot, making a land value of $133,350. The preferred stock is a lien on the assets and earnings of the company and takes precedence over the common stock.

Mr. H. F. Banta, president and general manager, has been engaged in the lumber, mill, furniture manufacturing and building business for the past thirty years. He has successfully built up several additions and is thoroughly familiar with the practical side of the building business and the cost of materials and operations. He has a well-defined plan for building these homes at the lowest possible cost to the purchaser and also a good profit for the stockholders.

The annual report of the Southern Pacific Company for 1921 may well afford stockholders in that company a great deal of satisfaction. In the first place, the company earned almost 9 per cent. on its capital stock, amply covering the dividend, as compared with only 10½ per cent. the previous year. It will be remembered that in 1920 the company benefited largely from government guarantees, and, still more important, had the benefit of income from its California oil properties. In 1921 no income, or practically none, accrued to the railroad from the latter group of properties. The second cause for satisfaction lies in the fact that last year, in spite of depressed business conditions and high wages during the first six months, the railroad properties alone earned sufficient income to pay the Southern Pacific dividend, without drawing upon outside income at all, say McDonnell & Co. in their June letter.

The report for 1921 does not disclose that upkeep of the road has been neglected in any way in an effort to make a good showing on the stock. On the contrary, maintenance expenditures consumed a larger proportion of gross income than in any recent year except 1920. In view of the wage cut of July, 1921, and considering the drop in the cost of materials, it seems probable that nearly as much actual physical work was accomplished in 1921 as in 1920. Southern Pacific does not carry as heavy traffic over its lines as the Eastern trunk lines; a considerable portion of its mileage is single track; and certain parts of its roadbed are still relatively new, so that an expenditure of a definite sum on maintenance will accomplish a great deal more for Southern Pacific than for the carriers serving a more densely settled territory. Yet Southern Pacific has always been very conservative with regard to upkeep, and per mile its maintenance expenditures compare very favorably with those of carriers serving denser traffic points.

In forming a conclusion as to the future of Southern Pacific a number of factors must be taken into consideration outside of actual railroad operations. Perhaps the most important of these is the growing competition of steamships through the Panama Canal. Shipments by water are ordinarily somewhat more economical than by rail, other things being equal, in any event. But other things are not equal. In this case, the steamship lines enjoy freedom from rate jurisdiction by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which gives them an enormous advantage. In 1921 the number of steamship voyages through the Panama Canal between Atlantic and Pacific ports increased 80 per cent. over 1920, and the volume of freight handled increased 83 per cent. Other roads, also, feel the burden of this competition, of course, but the heaviest blow falls on Southern Pacific. It is probable that one reason for the great increase of Panama Canal traffic in 1921 lay in the paucity of ocean cargoes, and many boats were only temporarily diverted to the coast-wise lines. Nevertheless, year after year, this competition is becoming more serious for Southern Pacific.

The recent Supreme Court decision, ordering the road to divest itself of its ownership in Central Pacific, adds another unknown factor to the Southern Pacific situation. It is not likely, however, that in this particular case the results will be disastrous, because the days of cutthroat railroad competition are over in this country. On the other hand, the Supreme Court decision seems to indicate that a separation of the two roads involves something more than an academic problem, and that Central Pacific is at present being used to divert important traffic to the parent road. Undoubtedly the segregation will not

The fact that a security is called a bond does not make it a safe investment. There are bonds—and bonds!

To be safe, a bond must have back of it a permanent earning ability adequate to meet all the business requirements of the obligor corporation. To be safe, a bond must be further fortified by a preponderate property value to which the bondholder has recourse in case of necessity.

The investor can judge for himself whether a bond is properly safe-guarded, once the facts are established. It is the function of the "underwriting" bond house to establish these facts by thorough, first-hand investigation. In this respect, our high standards are a permanent assurance of safety for our clients.

Whatever we may say about our foreign trade in the fiscal year which ends with the current month, its "favorable trade balance" or excess of exports over imports will far exceed that of any year prior to the war. The biggest "favorable trade balance" that we ever had prior to the war, says the Trade Record of the National City Bank of New York, was $666,000,000 in the fiscal year 1908, $665,000,000 in 1901, and $653,000,000 in 1913. In the fiscal year 1914, all of which elapsed before the beginning of the war, the excess of exports over imports was $470,653,000, and in the fiscal year which ends with this month will be approximately $1,140,000,000, or 140 per cent. over that of the year preceding the war, and nearly 100 per cent. above that of any pre-war year.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Reference books seem to be at the peak of public interest at present, with the second volume of the marvelous "Outline of Science" (G. P. Putnam's Sons; $3.75) setting the popular pace. This series of four volumes, two published, two to come, is really one of the most important popular scientific works that has ever been published. Formerly, in order to make science interesting to the layman it had to be robbed of its detail and therefore of its accuracy. Most people love broad generalizations such as the popular notion that man is descended from monkeys, which no reputable scientist holds for a moment. However, the amount of patient study necessary to realize the exact relation of the man to the monkey is a bit arduous and the fact, once it is arrived at, is not so dramatically astounding. One has merely discovered that all life is related and the monkey happens to be a little more germane than the tadpole. We somehow are not so fascinated by the idea that we are descended from a crayfish. The element of the grotesque and the morbid is not there, and it is highly probable that if the early popularizers of Darwin's theories had been more true to those doctrines and less swayed by the vulgarly dramatic relation to the monkeys there never would have been a controversy and that evolution would have been accepted as painlessly as modern bacteriology and bloodless surgery. It was not to be. But it is consoling, now that we have run our several decades of the danger of a little knowledge that the average intelligence, is beginning to awaken to the importance of a thorough knowledge. It need not be as special as that of the trained scientist. But it can be accurate. Professor Thomson is one of the pioneers with H. G. Wells and Professor Van Loon, to break through the jungle of popular ignorance and clear the ground of its debris.

Admirers of W. H. Hudson, and their number is legion, will be interested in the new edition of "The Naturalist in La Plata," just published by E. P. Dutton & Co. One of the attractive features of the sixth printing is its inexpensiveness. Its cost is three dollars, to be explicit, and it will be remembered that the earlier editions were much more prohibitive. Moreover, the present volume is just as attractive as its predecessors, the letterpress and drawings being identical, the only difference is the replacing of old plates with new. For the benefit of any not familiar with this Hudson, it is a study of bird and animal life in the South American pampas. But it is impossible to suggest, even, the fascination of Hudson's crystal style and the glamour of interest with which he covers the most commonplace phenomena.

It is no exaggeration to say that one of the great needs of the age has been supplied with the new College Standard Dictionary (Funk & Wagnalls). Every one who has been annoyed by the awful bulk of an unabridged and by its inaccessibility, generally, will appreciate a dictionary that is of portable dimensions, that contains all the information sought by the average student, writer, or business man, and which last but not least sells for the moderate sum of five dollars. The thing that should be emphasized about the College Standard Dictionary is that it literally contains all of the desirable features of an unabridged work for any one other than a specialist. That is to say, its abridgment consists merely in dropping out the rarer scientific terminology and very unusual or obsolete words. A professional philologist, mathematician, or theologian would not find it an ideal ultimate reference work. The person of less special interests will find it perfectly satisfactory, inasmuch as the words dealt with—and there are 140,000 terms defined—are exhaustively treated. The new dictionary is designed primarily to meet the needs of the college student and for that purpose it is ideal, for its authority and recency are indisputable—four hundred specialists having collaborated to produce this efficient volume. The only feature we regret is the absence of maps. But, after all, it is a dictionary and not a gazetteer.

Notes of Books and Authors.

Frank Swinnerton is writing a new novel, full length this time, called "The Three Lovers." It is to be published by the George H. Doran Company.

A sketch of John Galsworthy's life and works has been issued in booklet form by Charles Scribner's Sons. A copy will be sent to any one requesting it.

"Maurice Guest" has just been reissued with an introduction by Mr. Hugh Walpole. It appeared first in the year 1908. The author is "H. H. Richard." But whether the name stands for a man or woman is one of the unsolved problems of literature.

A new book by George Moore, in a limited edition, is announced by Boni & Liveright. It is entitled "In Strict Singleness: Theme and Variation." The first five volumes of a definitive limited edition of the "Complete Works" of George Moore will be published next month. This set will include two volumes never published before.

The French historian, George Lenotre, whose history of the little lost Dauphin, Louis XVII, was published in this country last fall by Doubleday, Page & Co., has published a later book in Paris under the title, "The Impresario of the French Revolution." The "impresario" was Baron Jean de Batz, "the great unknown" of Gascony. The book has been translated into German.

The Oxford University Press American Branch is publishing immediately an "Historical Atlas of South Africa," by Eric A. Walker, consisting of twenty-six maps, crown folio, with explanatory letterpress.

What with Georg Brandes celebrating his eightieth birthday, Gerhart Hauptmann seems quite a youngster at sixty. His native Silesia is planning a great celebration in honor of his birthday; its outstanding feature will be the performance of the festival series of Hauptmann's plays from August 8th to 21st. These will be produced in three theatres in Breslau with the greatest of Germany's actors as participants. Hauptmann's conspicuous place in the German theatre is attested by the way in which they wax enthusiastic over new productions of his old plays. Only a few weeks ago "The Sunken Bell" was given at Reinhardt's Grosses Schauspielhaus in Berlin. Seven volumes of Hauptmann's dramas, about twenty-five in all, have thus far been translated into English, and among his novels "Atlantis" and "The Fool in Christ" have appeared in English. All of these are published by B. W. Huebsch.

The Houghton Mifflin Company is planning to bring out in the near future a complete sixteen-volume edition of Lafcadio Hearn's works. The first edition will be limited to 750 copies, each set being autographed by Mme. Hearn. There will be 125 full-page illustrations, many of them taken especially by Burton Holmes, who is now engaged in this work in Japan. In speaking with a newspaper man Mr. Holmes said this was one of the most delightful assignments of his career. "Ordinary pictures of the Japan visited by the tourists—Yokohama, Tokyo, Kobe—will not do. That was not the Japan that Hearn knew. He lived in the real Japan, teaching English in the schools of small towns."

Charles Scribner's Sons announce for future publication a series of approximately ten volumes on the evolution of the earth and its inhabitants. Each book is to be written by a leading American authority. The series will set forth, in the light of latest investigation and discovery, the formation of worlds, the

The first two volumes, announced for publication next fall, will be "The Mechanism of Evolution," by Edwin Grant Conklin, professor of biology at Princeton University, and "The Racial History of Man," by Roland B. Nearly twenty-five years ago the "best seller" in London, though the term "best seller" had scarcely been invented, says John o' London's Weekly, was "Deeds That Won the Empire." It was written by a young Australian divine, Dr. W. H. Fitchett, accepted by the now lapsed firm of Smith, Elder & Co., and quickly ran into a score and more of editions. Perhaps it benefited from the spirit of empire created by Kipling's "Barrack-Room Ballads," but, anyhow, it begat several other volumes of the same sort by Dr. Fitchett. He is visiting England this summer, and he has been asked to write his impressions as he finds it after the war.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Copper Streak Trail.

The lode of the cowboy novel seems never to be completely worked. So long at least as there are cowboys extant to record the yarns of their remarkable profession, we shall probably have a steady output of the distinctly American Western story. "Copper Streak Trail" belongs to the bona fide variety that is written by actual cowboys, its author, Eugene Manlove Rhodes, having pursued the devious career of a cowpuncher for twenty-five years. In addition to the requisite features of numerous cowboys, cowmen, ranchers, etc., a copper mine and a quantity of fast shooting, Mr. Rhodes has caught the spirit of the adventurous days he writes about. He writes in the crisp cowboy idiom, which is no doubt responsible for the atmosphere and local color of his book.

COPPER STREAK TRAIL. By Eugene M. Rhodes. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.75.

The Yellow Poppy.

Readers with a taste for historic fiction will enjoy "The Yellow Poppy," by D. K. Broster, a cleverly written romance of the French revolution. The plot pivots about the attempt of the leader of an army of Chouans to recover the fabled treasure of Mirabel for the good of the Royalist cause. Though distinctly of the class of historical fiction that borrows the pageantry of history to deck its stage, "The Yellow Poppy" does revive the spirit of the closing eighteenth century to a marked degree. D. K. Broster has evidently been a careful student of historical detail. As a story "The Yellow Poppy" is vivified romance and adventure.

Single Songs of a Hundred Poets.

Paul Elder & Co. have imported recently an edition of the unique book, "Hyakunin-Isshu," the Japanese century of poets. This translation, which was made about twenty-five years ago and published by the Asiatic Society of Japan, is of the collection or cycle of Japanese poems which date from the Japanese prehistoric period and are representative of classic Japanese verse. The poems, which are very brief, single statements in fact, are somewhat akin to the epigram and rhymed fable of Western poetry. The "Single Songs of a Hundred Poets," as they are colloquially known in Japan, are household expressions. Men, women, and children know them. Professor MacCauley's introduction to them, in fact, was due to their prevalent use as a parlor game. They are here published in an attractive new edition with literary and historic footnotes of explanation.

In the same volume, Professor MacCauley includes a naga-uta, or "long poem," which in this case happens to be a three-hundred-year-old acrostic of the forty-seven syllabics that compose Japanese speech. The subject of the naga-uta, which is given in both the original and in translation, is "The Dominant Note of the Law" of Buddhism. Dr. MacCauley, who is a widely-known Orientalist, has recently returned from Japan and is residing in Berkeley.

The Scarlet Tanager.

The future is always more intriguing than the past, and prophecy will always have its mede of devotion. The novelist occasionally departs from the beaten path of history and the even more usual convention of the present to peer into the future—not clairvoyantly, but deductively. "The Scarlet Tanager" is such an experiment. It has the interest that attaches to speculations on the future of politics and international diplomacy. "The Scarlet Tanager" is full of action, mystery, and intrigue.

The Little Corner Never Conquered.

In distinction to the war books that deluged the reading public during and immediately after the war are those in the Red Cross Series, carefully constructed surveys of the war work they deal with. The latest of this important series is "The Little Corner Never Conquered," by John Van Schaick, Jr., formerly Red Cross commissioner to Belgium. His book is the story of the American Red Cross work for Belgium, and its preparation and writing have been deliberately delayed till the author felt sufficient time perspective had been gained. Probably the most authentic records of the war have been kept by this series, which includes Hungerford's "With the Doughboys in France," Davison's "Story of the American Red Cross," and Fife's "The Passing Legions."

The Radio Amateur's Handbook.

Radio books multiply themselves by the dozen, though judging from the popularity of radio experimentation, they can not be too numerous. However, "The Radio Amateur's Handbook" merits special attention, as it is by Frederick Collins, inventor of the wireless telephone. Mr. Collins made his important discovery in 1899 and was awarded a gold medal for his invention at the Alaska-Pacific-Yukon Exposition in 1909. He is the author of several other works on wireless telegraphy and telephony, but the present volume is of particular interest to amateurs and radio fans. The material is presented so that one knowing nothing about radio 'phoning may learn the nature of wireless telephony, install his set and begin experimenting. The volume is fully illustrated with charts, diagrams, and drawings.

The Three Golden Hairs.

Ethel Sidgwick, whose charming work is known to all adult readers of English novels, has a distinct talent in writing for children. Her "Four Plays for Children" has come to be regarded as a children's classic. Her present volume, "The Three Golden Hairs" and "The Robber Bridegroom," two famous stories from Grimm made into plays, will probably have a similar fate. These two plays are for somewhat older children than were the "Four Plays." They can be produced easily in the school or home and are an important addition to dramatic literature for children.

THE MAN CHAMPOLLION.

One hundred years ago at a famous session of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres, Jean-François Champollion announced a new discovery by which he snatched their secret from the centuries and opened to science and history the knowledge of ancient Egypt. He was the first man, says L'Europe Nouvelle, to succeed in unraveling the hitherto impenetrable mystery of the hieroglyphics. Some months later the Duke of Orleans solemnly assumed possession, in the name of France, of this amazing acquisition; but the Academy, always a little slow in making up its mind, thought it well to keep Champollion waiting a little while for the chair that it owed him. He took this with the spirit of "a sophisticated drinker who tastes a bottle of champagne that has been going flat for six months." Presumably the institute will make up for this injustice, and on the 17th of next September will solemnly commemorate the centenary of this astonishing discovery, as it ought to do.

All this gives us the desire to look a little more closely upon the countenance and character of the illustrious Champollion. What a surprise! For this scientist is also a man of personal charm. Where one might have expected to encounter one of those tiresome doctors of 'ologies and 'isms, specialists in the dustiest knowledge, one finds a young man, ardent, winning, devoured with the desire to know, and endowed with the most admirable qualities: intellectual curiosity, a poetic mind, irony, gayety, generosity, modesty.

Thus Jean-François Champollion appears in a little volume published some twenty years ago by M. de la Brière (Champollion inconnu), where one finds abundant and interesting extracts from the great man's correspondence with his family, to which we must attach a good deal of importance because it gives us information of a genius' childhood and intellectual growth.

Champollion, born in Figeac in 1790, had an older brother, who was established at Grenoble and already known for his scientific works. It was this brother who, in order to relieve his parents, took charge of his junior, of whose remarkable gifts there were indications even from infancy. He had the boy come to Grenoble to finish his studies at the lycée, and from there the young Jean-François sent almost daily to his brother the extraordinary correspondence that has been preserved in the family archives at the Château de Vif, where Condillac and Mably once lived.

In these letters we follow day by day the astonishing spectacle of an intelligence expanding until it desires to absorb everything. The boy is not satisfied with his scholastic programme; his curiosity exceeds it. He wants nothing to remain foreign to him: Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldean, Arabic, Syrian, are languages that soon become familiar to him. At thirteen, before the prefect of the Department of Isère, who was overwhelmed at so much knowledge, he explained a chapter of Genesis in the Hebrew text; and since there was no prize for these languages in the Lycée at Grenoble, the teachers had to give him a prize for arithmetic in order to reward such zeal. The best part of the joke is that this born polyglot had never studied mathematics.

HAS IT A MORAL?

Dramatists no longer write plays with morals hitched to them. You must draw your own moral, if you can find it, but it isn't apt to be any too obvious.

For instance, in "Dangerous Ages"—I refer to it confidently, for every one is reading it—the conservative reader, who likes sugar-coated unrealities, says: "Did you ever see such an unsatisfactory lot of people? No-body is satisfied. Well, yes, I concede that the eighty-year-old seems to get some joy out of life still, and the young man—Barney, isn't that his name?—is a nice, likable chap. But I have no use for the rest, always reaching out for something, they don't know what."

It seems to me that the discriminating reader can extract a whole bunch of aphorisms from this book. The character of the octogenarian mother admonishes us that if we exercise our sympathy, our toleration, and our mind, we can enjoy life to the end. The self-absorbed sexagenarian mother serves as a beacon-light, exposing the dangers of self-centredness, and a carefully nursed egoism. The forty-year-old mother is entering upon that phase common to the married women of today, when the glow of early love has dulled, the children have grown up, and the time for a career outside the home has passed. The only remedy for restless yearning would seem to be to resign one's self to become the universal consoler and binder up of family wounds, thus minimizing the teasing claims of self.

That figure representative of the disquieting, just-risen generation, young Gerda, with her countenance of springtime innocence and her arid philosophy of life, learns through love that her rebellious generation must conform to the long-tested law of legitimate union, or else be stoned by the hitherto despised conventionalists; and even progressives object to being stoned.

Barney's life of hard work and unselfish service brings him happiness and affection; an affection in thirty-year-old Nannie's case that is ultimately denied because, in her hungry curiosity to increase her knowledge and experience of life, she herself had remained too long a denier.

Why, the book is fairly crammed with morals, if you want to call them so; and, if we will, we may deduce a moral or so from each of the plays of the week.

A. A. Milne generally has a nugget of wisdom imbedded in the apparent superficiality of his plays. It has evidently riled him to remark how often adherence to a dense conservatism is unconsciously cruel and unjust. So he has constructed a situation showing well-deserved happiness and affection between a husband who is a rooted conservative and conventionalist on the one hand and a wife who has an irresistible sense of real justice on the other. Fate threatens to disrupt their admirably happy and apparently secure union because of the dismaying resurrection of a worthless husband of the wife. And the wife sees that it is ridiculous that the legal code, in this case, is on the side of the rogue; and the husband, dismayed and inconsolable, is yet incapable of complaint against the law because it is the law; which would seem to suggest the advisability of an improvement on it.

"The Circle" at first glance seems, not immoral, but unmoral, because of the serenely unmoral condition in which the majority of its characters live, and move, and have their being. Elizabeth is pure-minded, and romantic, and compassionate; except toward her husband; for when she loves she hesitates not a moment about sundering her marital bonds. Arnold, her husband, employs a trick to hold her back, but the awakening of her conscience only lasts until the next temptation.

The lover hesitates not at all to subject his lady to the cruel assaults of a life of presumably un sanctified union, because to him love speaks with an imperious voice. All he considers is that he offers her a vigorously manly love to place against the tepid affection of a prig. The love between them is wholesome; he feels and knows it, because of their mutual love of the wholesome things of outdoors.

So, against wise counsel and interested and disinterested advice, destiny's circle is complete, and another round of tragically shattered lives begins. We are quite clear-sighted, for Lady Kitty and Lord Porteous offer a terrible example. Elizabeth may not become the meretricious object into which Lady Kitty has evolved, but she will suffer more; and it is quite clear that her dominant lover will become a chronically disgusted grump, like Lord Porteous.

So there is your moral, in spite of the tone of cynical detachment in which the author presents his theme. He does not roll his eyes, nor beat his breast. He says, virtually, love is mightier than the law. But all the same the moral is there for those who want to pick it up.

ACTING AS AN ART.

Sometimes one could find it in one's heart to pity the young things who enter upon the life of a player burning with youthful enthusiasms, only to find that commercialism in the business forces them to kick their high and holy ideals into the discard. I do not consider that we really know whether or not the pretty and brisk little "adorable girl," as I heard some one call her, in "Mr. Pim" can really act. She goes through the motions, but as if they were all impressed on her from the outside; perhaps by a mistaken stage director who counseled her to imitate some predecessor in the part. For imitation is not acting. Acting is an art, and art must have a soul at its core.

The girl whose art has a soul is playing in "The Circle." Plainly, Betty Linley—who, it seems, has taken for a stage name that of the Betty Linley of her family who, several generations ago, eloped with and married the great Sheridan—has a preconceived idea for the part of Elizabeth, and seeks so earnestly to give it shape that one quite forgets to try to make a hit. But at the same time she is fitting with sure instinct into the rôle of a girl who is nothing if not reposefully genuine. Her theory, it is plain to see, to the close observer, is to make over her inner being so that it becomes the soul of Elizabeth. Hence the simple, sure realism with which she depicts that romantic young grasper of a happiness that is prohibited by the social code. Elizabeth is an unconscious pagan, and so Miss Linley portrays her, working from the inner spirit she has, with an artist's instinct, imagined, to the external expression of that spirit.

While comparing the results of two different ways of working in young beginners—speaking comparatively—it is, to us San Franciscans who are denied so many interesting theatrical attractions, next to impossible not to compare the two mature comedienne who are featured in the two companies.

To begin with Mrs. Leslie Carter, withdrawn for a time from the stage of which she was once an ornament, albeit a somewhat over-flashing one—Mrs. Carter never seemed wholly the artist, in spite of a remarkable ability to lash herself into a tempest of histrionic emotion, sweeping simultaneously a vigorous hand over the chords of the receptivities.

Now why was it so? Because, most certainly, when destiny called Mrs. Carter to the stage it called her to the place where she belonged. During her prime she was a noted and popular figure, and the public eagerly thronged to see the celebrity whose popularity was so assiduously nursed by her producer. For Belasco recognized her gift of temperament, which, although it was not used with finesse or distinction, was unquestionably a great gift.

It is, however, as a comedienne that Mrs. Carter comes to us now, her work showing the poise and ease of a thoroughly experienced actress, but still characterized by a lack of the intellectual insight which should have made her Lady Kitty a portrait touched with the lights of high comedy, instead of with those of caricature, however amusing we found it.

The other comedienne, Laura Hope Crews, is the one who employs her gift of comedy with a fine and unerring intelligence. Not a single effect was overstressed. Not once did a heavy touch spoil the delicacy of the effect, or make us think of the actress instead of the character acted. For the finer comedienne was always within the character, whereas the other at times asserted her own personality over that of Lady Kitty.

Hypercriticism, you say? Not at all. It's all in the way of discussion of an art that we are not any too often permitted to see interpreted or illumined, or interestingly conveyed by the lights of the stage.

STRINDBERG REMEMBERED

This is an era of revivals. They have had a successful cycle of Galsworthy plays in London, and have had in contemplation a revival of Jones and Pinero plays, although Pinero's new play—after a long silence—"The Enchanted Cottage"—was withdrawn.

They also revived Paul Potter's dramatization of Du Maurier's "Trilby," Ibsen's "Hedda Gabler," Pinero's "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," Barrie's "Quality Street" and "What Every Woman Knows," and many more. All which goes to prove that theatrical producers dare not risk their money on the uncertainties attending new plays.

In the end the public is the gainer. There is something tragic in the too early retirement of fine works of the stage, owing to the public thirst for novelty. What do we out here know of some of the best works of these and other dramatists that we have never seen? But if they have successful London and New York revivals our local little theatres are apt to follow suit.

One of the most notable revivals was that of August Strindberg's "Creditors," which was produced at the Greenwich Village Theatre; notable because of the standing of Strindberg as a dramatist, which is very generally recognized by intellectualists, if not by the theatre-going public. It is claimed that this was the first New York production of "Creditors," which ranks with "Countess Julia" and "The Father" as one of Strindberg's dramatic masterpieces.

In the same month the Hanoverians in Germany enjoyed the opportunity of seeing represented for the first time upon the stage "Christus," the third part of the biblical-historical trilogy found among Strindberg's posthumous works.

"Christus" is a variation of the miracle play of the Middle Ages, and in fifteen brief scenes unfolds the great drama in which figured Mary, Joseph, the Savior, Pilate, Herod, and Caiaphas. The drama shows the religious impotence of the Romans, wallowing in voluptuous vice, before the holy influence of the carpenter's son; the entire trilogy revealing Strindberg's native ability in the dramatic field.

It is rather curious that "Christus" should first be presented in materialistic Germany instead of Strindberg's native land, but so it was, in April of this year, the Germans taking much credit to themselves in consequence.

And they do well to honor, by any posthumous recognition of his work, Sweden's giant intellectualist, who produced an inconceivably colossal output of literature. One of his countrymen, Edwin Björkman, a fine literary critic who wrote a very discerning and sympathetic monograph on Strindberg's character and works, states that he wrote fifty-six plays, nineteen volumes of novels and stories, eleven volumes of autobiographical fiction, and several dozen additional volumes of historical and scientific writings. Even in his native country, whose literature he not only deeply influenced, but which he developed and shaped, Strindberg's compatriots scarcely recognized how remarkable was the strange, truculent genius who lived in such sternly preserved retirement; for his works showed profound and varied learning, a fearless psychology in the depiction of human characters in his novels and plays, as unusual, even startling, unreserve in his autobiographical fiction, and an absolute freedom from subservience to established tradition.

"Countess Julia" and "The Father" attracted much attention in their time, but to the superficial-minded public the savagely misanthropic attitude toward women in both plays made it impossible to do full justice to their impeccable technique, and to the dramatic intensity of their situations. And truly "Countess Julia" is shocking, even revolting, but Strindberg wrote it, not to shock people, as do the fleshly Latin playwrights, but to show the mental degeneration induced by the idle, self-indulgent lives of patricians; and, in "The Father," to record the eternal duel between the sexes, and to show how the Iago-like, diabolical cunning of a woman can so master a husband of intellect, and, like Othello, of free and noble nature, as to drive him to madness and death.

Naturally women do not like the works of such a confirmed misogynist, because of his apparently blasphemous attitude toward marital affection. Three times Strindberg tried wedded love, and three times the union ended in struggle, conflict, hatred, and separation. He took an unworthy revenge on his first wife when he wrote "A Fool's Confession," in which he unsparingly portrays the hideous torments of a marriage between two contending beings whose former love has been degraded into an instrument of torture.

Yet, as we read such terrible records as these of the duel between the sexes we must, in charity, pause and remember that Strindberg was a being of strong affections, who loved children, and had for his own supremely the father's heart. Indeed, the unhappy man was really an idealist, and if he had shown in his mercilessly exaggerated portrayal of the faults of womankind the same clear, detached logic that he showed in his non-fiction, and even in some of his short stories in the volume called "Married," there would be greatly enhanced value in his character studies of the opposite sex.

A discerning English critic wrote, very truly: "The typical Strindberg woman is a fiend with the physique of a Madonna, and the soul of a vampire, who sucks dry the lifeblood of her heroic victim. The typical Strindberg man is a Samson shorn of his strength, writhing in the toils of some Delilah, protesting vociferously, and yet taking a morbid delight in his own bondage."

But whoever reads the autobiographical records of Strindberg's disastrous ventures into marriage, can but pity him, for as Anatole France, the great French psychologist, says of him: "We may judge this man severely, but there is one greatness we can not deny him; he was very unhappy, and that is not the lot of a mean soul."

The Coast Range Calaveras

The name Calaveras immediately suggests to Californians the Mother Lode country where Mark Twain discovered the jumping frog that made him famous.

The Calaveras Reservoir of the Spring Valley Water Company, an integral part of San Francisco's water supply system, has nothing to do with Calaveras County in the Sierra foothills. It is the Coast Range Calaveras.

The Calaveras Reservoir is an artificial lake in a beautiful region of Alameda and Santa Clara Counties midway between Niles Cañon and Mount Hamilton.

It impounds the water of a number of streams that flow down the gorges of the Coast Range in the general direction of Niles Cañon. Two of these streams, Smith and Isabel Creeks, after circling Mount Hamilton, unite to form the Arroyo Hondo that flows through Calaveras Valley.

Acquired by the Spring Valley Water Company in 1875, this natural reservoir site has been ever since an important unit of San Francisco's water supply.

It is destined to play a much more important part in the immediate future.

At present Calaveras Reservoir has a capacity of 8 billion gallons of water.

Under an agreement with the City and County of San Francisco, the Railroad Commission requires Spring Valley to enlarge Calaveras Dam to a height of 175 feet, so that it will impound 32 billion gallons of water, thus adding 24 million gallons daily to the water supply of this city.

The design of the Calaveras Dam, however, provides for an ultimate height of 210 feet, at which height the reservoir will yield 50 million gallons daily, doubling our present water supply.

SPRING VALLEY

known to the housewife: the daily dishwashing.

There is something about the smell of dishwater, the cleaning up of domestic grease in a sink, and the scrubbing of pots and pans that gets our goat; excuse the ugly slang, but it requires an ugly expression to do justice to the subject. And anyway, all the English purists nowadays are indulging themselves by using American slang; so why not we?

I remember that some optimistic teller of stories for girls once described the process of dishwashing—presided over by a pretty girl in spotless calico—with the delicate china emerging from its hot bath of rainbow soapsuds, and all the details cunningly contrived to suggest picturesque purification; but it is only in stories that the disagreeable details could be glossed over or minimized over.

The only thing that can be said for dishwashing—as an agreeable occupation, I mean—is that, when two congenial friends join in the process, the tongues become wonderfully loosened by the sociability of the occupation, and delightfully interesting secrets are apt to be given away.

The universality of dishwater in our present life, the manner in which its flood tide greasily menaces the security of family happiness, and the recognition by various members of a family that when the housewife has prepared an elaborate repast it is wisdom to rescue her from the dishwashing that may prove the breaking point, has finally figured in the drama, Christopher Morley having written a dish-watery little one-acter called "Thursday Evening." (I almost think he ought to have called it "Dishwater," in recognition of the axiom that one touch of nature makes the whole world kin.)

There is nothing wonderful about the little play, but the author has woven a neat little exposition of how brittle conjugal tempers become when they are subjected to the unannealing trial of hot dishwater.

But in recognition that all except the very well-to-do—and they, too, occasionally, when the haughty ninety-dollar cook suddenly and capriciously jumps her job—are subjected to immersions in dishwater, I would not be surprised if Mr. Morley's neat playlet, which is published by the Stewart & Kidd Company, would not have quite a vogue at amateur performances and in little theatres.

GILBERT AND SULLIVAN.

To read of the recent Gilbert and Sullivan revival in London is to realize that here in San Francisco we have been in the swim without knowing it. For in London they have been having a resurrection of the old operas of such magnitude, in the immensity of the response made by the public, that it is now considered nothing short of remarkable, even in the world's metropolis.

It was, most appropriately, the D'Oyly Carte management, so widely known thirty-five or forty years ago for its identification with the early fame of the greatest of burlesque operas, that decided to have a Gilbert and Sullivan revival, and it has been rewarded by an unprecedented, an overwhelming success. People stood in the immense line that formed—or hired others to stand—for twenty-four hours at a stretch, and when, after their night out, they fell by the wayside, the considerate management issued tickets entitling them to resume the place they had unquestionably won, when they returned after a day's rest to relieve the hired district messengers.

As is always the case in the now numerous Gilbert and Sullivan revivals, "Mikado" was the favorite. Besides the usual favorites, "The Yeoman of the Guard," "The Gondoliers," and "Ruddigore" met with immense favor. All three of those operas, it will be remembered, as well as "The Sorcerer," were represented here at the Players Theatre this year, and put on with charming scenic effect, good choruses, and professional-appearing players and singers, resulting in a general finish that caused each representation to have a successful run.

So we may project our local chests a little and say to ourselves, "Well, this time we got ahead of old Lunnion."

EQUITY PLAYERS, INC.

More than $100,000 has been advanced by about half a hundred eminent New York players to finance an actors' theatre, thus making a step forward in the history of the American stage that all friends of an enlightened drama dare to hope will lead to consequences of magnitude.

It is early times to flap wings and crow, but it looks as if, at last, a solution may be reached for the innumerable problems confronting the wealthy altruist who has been approached and urged to endow a free, or, in other words, an uncommercial theatre.

The hitch always was that the uncommercial theatre would need to win commercial success in order to stand firmly on its legs. No altruist, however generous, was ever found willing to endow a theatre that he couldn't be sure wouldn't tumble over eventually.

And nobody ever before hit on the solution: players themselves to be the altruists.

The Actors' Equity Association, knowing, no doubt, that there would be considerable agitation in the eeries of the big producers, worked out its plans in secret meetings; as a result of which "Equity Players, Inc.," materialized.

The funds of the two organizations are not identical, the financial part of the new enterprise being supplied by the underwriting of the Guarantors' Committee, whose numbers are to be enhanced, it is hoped and believed, by many people outside the profession. Thus the wealthy altruist may assist the enterprise without serving as its entire prop.

The personal interest and pride that players will feel in "Equity Players, Inc.," will be a valuable asset, and personal jealousies and rivalries can scarcely count, as the stage director will select players for their talent or fitness.

In other words, the organization will be conducted in a business-like manner. And while that is done it will probably endeavor to correct such abuses as the deadening of fine talent by keeping it imprisoned for a year or two within the limitations of one rôle.

It is too soon, perhaps, for theatre-goers on the Pacific Coast to dare hope for much, but one can't help indulging in a wish, at all events, that when "Equity Players, Inc.," is firmly established it may send companies of first-class talent our way; for the personnel of the players who are charter members of the association is reassuring.

Here are some of the names best known to people on this Coast: George Arliss, Alexandra Carlisle, Dorothy Donnelly, Jane Cowl, Wallace Eddinger, Elsie Ferguson, Frank Gilmore, Alfred Hickman, O. P. Heggie, De Wolf Hopper, Edith Wynne Mathison, Nance O'Neill, Effie Shannon, Brandon Tynan, and Florence Reed.

TITLES OF PLAYS.

Naming a play is a very important act, for people can easily be repelled into a lack of interest by a name which lacks punch, or is too vague in its suggestions, while one that suggests a leading idea that attracts will draw their money. I don't know who was responsible for changing Ben Hecht's choice of "The Poseur" to "The Mountebank of Emotions," but the latter, however unsympathetic or uncomprehensive the former may be, is much worse, because it doesn't catch hold of the mind or the tongue. I wouldn't be at all surprised if the reason why Leo Ditrichstein returned to "Toto" and "The Great Lover" the last week of his engagement was partly because the title of these two plays did not antagonize the sympathies.

I have not yet discovered why the picture-play producers are so set on changing the names of famous plays, such as "The Admirable Crichton," when they are pictured. "Male and Female" is a name that could apply as well as to any other play in which males and females fall in love, and lacks distinctiveness.

"Passion" and "Deception" both succeeded, not because of any assistance contributed by their titles, but in spite of them, both being vague and colorless.

"Orphans of the Storm" is a good, high-sounding, suggestive title. One admires it partly because of its dramatic value, partly because it has a touch of poetry. But, after all, it is the picturization of a famous old melodrama that is entitled to the distinction conferred by its original name.

And now comes a revival of the famous play, "Hindle Wakes." The title has a meaning and a value. It is the name given to an annual rustic festivity, and it is the point in the play upon which the crux of the drama hangs.

Yet for the occasion of its New York revival they have changed it to "Fanny Hawthorne," a name that has lost all the originality of the real title—which has vitality—and is easily forgotten.

Henry Miller, I think, did wisely in adhering to the original title of the Bataille play. For its French birth is well insisted on, a literal translation of the title would not convey the right idea, and, furthermore, "La Tendresse" is easily pronounceable by everybody—not at all an unimportant detail. I notice, by the way, an anticipation expressed in the New York press that of the three San Francisco try-outs by Miller "La Tendresse" is the one he will choose for a New York run. But if he does I venture to prophesy that he will find it advisable to shorten a number of scenes, and, after all, it is more than probable that he will find that his New York clientèle will choose "The Awful Truth."

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

At the Columbia Theatre, beginning Monday night, July 10th, William Harris, Jr., will present John Drinkwater's play, "Abraham Lincoln," with Frank McGlynn and a company of about forty. There will be no Sunday performances, but there will be matinées Wednesday and Saturday. Mail orders are being accepted and the box-office sale opens Thursday morning, July 6th.

Frank McGlynn has played many times in San Francisco, his native heath, but it has remained for the part of Lincoln to bring his fine talents to the attention of the world. He is now internationally known for his excellent performance in this part. As a token of recognition a committee will meet him when he reaches the Ferry and escort him to the Palace Hotel, where a luncheon will be tendered him.

Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln" is a play for the people. Without any of the obvious war atmosphere about it, the drama carries all the thrills of the civil war. It is told in the simple idiom which was Lincoln's, and this adds to the illusion that the spectator is not only meeting Lincoln himself, but the many notable figures who were grouped about him. There has never been but one company playing Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln." Three years have passed since the first production of the play in New York.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Mildred Harris has risen to the top in the firmament of picture stars, but has deserted the silver sheet for the legitimate stage and is fair on her way to rank in the top row of stage stars. She brings an exceptionally clever playlet.

Leo Carrillo, star of "Lombardi, Ltd.," will appear in his inimitable dialect stories.

Kerekjarto, the sensational royal genius of the violin, has created a furor with his music.

Flo Lewis is a dainty comedienne with a brand new comedy idea. Miss Lewis hands out a laugh a minute.

Barnes and Moyer keep their audience in a state bordering on hysterics.

Bill Robinson, "the Dark Cloud of Joy," is dancing and kidding his way into the hearts of his hearers. Robinson is a veritable riot of fun.

Martin and Moore are exceptional aerialists doing their famous "Seal Whip Turn." Their act is thrilling and highly entertaining.

Chong and Rose Moey are a dainty Chinese pair who give their conception of American songs and dances.

LEGAL ETHICS.

Some Harvard antediluvians may remember how good old Dr. Peabody, trying to instruct uninstructional freshmen in moral science, used to emit the comprehensive question, "What eez ethics?" Stammering and uncertain was the answer of that infant class, says the New York Times. So, when one reads the article, reprinted from the Minnesota Law Review, of Mr. Rome G. Brown, an eminent Minneapolis lawyer, on "Some Applications of the Rules of Legal Ethics," one doesn't discover too clearly what legal ethics is. The American Bar Association has its "Canons of Ethics." There are statutes and decisions in regard to the conduct of lawyers which serve as precedents. The decisions of committees of bar associations are another class of precedents. Then there are the opinions of the writers of law books on the subject and articles in law magazines. Altogether "there is, in the conduct of lawyers and particular instances, a common law of legal ethics, so to speak, in the light of which all formulated statutes and codes should be construed and applied."

Legal ethics, like the law, is always changing and developing. Perhaps the layman will be more interested in the rise of lawyers in the United States than in their ethics. Knowing that some two-thirds of our Presidents have been lawyers, that our Congresses and legislatures have always swarmed with them, one is surprised—we won't say gratefully surprised—to find that the eighteenth century was well along before lawyers as a class amounted to much, socially or politically, in the Colonies. "In Massachusetts," Mr. Brown, quoting from a book by Chief Justice Taft, tells us, "it was not until 1663 that an attorney was permitted to sit in the general court, and it was a long time after that before he was allowed to receive any fee or compensation for his professional services."

The explanation of the obscurity and unimportance of lawyers in the earlier Colonial days is simple enough. The country was too poor for them to live on. Commerce was mainly in English hands. A roadless land of woods and wilderness, of farmers and fishermen and hunters, offered scant material to the profession. There was no means for training lawyers, if there had been use for their services; and, presumably, such specimens of the tribe as did find their way over here left England for its good. And, for a long time, there were no law reporters, so the judges are lost in silence. Gradually in the villages some kind of half-lawyers appeared, ignorant, no doubt, but at least less noxious than the contemporary rude doctors of the time, full of superstitions that would seem absurd now in a treatise on witchcraft.

Besides, many of the colonists had been bothered or hunted by the officers of the law on account of their theological beliefs. It was natural that neither they nor their immediate descendants should pine for the gentlemen of the long robe. William Penn's Draft of Laws for his colony reflects this reminiscence of religious persecution. William and the provincial assembly after him directed that "in all courts all persons of all persuasions may freely appear in their own way and according to their own manner, and there personally plead their own cause themselves, or if unable, by their friends." Two years after, in 1685, the provincial council tried to prevent attorneys "from pleading for reward." The assembly wouldn't stand for this, yet twenty years later a statute was enacted prescribing the form of oath to be taken by collectors and attorneys. It contained these words, satisfactory and ethical to the lay mind: "Thou shalt increase no fees, but be contented with such fees which are or shall be allowed by the laws of this province."

Prescribed and regulated fees! A maximum fee law! Dreams of the layman, ever meanly anxious to choose the lawyer and the doctor. Well, in the eighteenth century some educated barristers came over here. Some of our young men, particularly from the South, read law in the Temple. The colleges turned out their small squads. Men of vigorous intelligence, with no "early advantages," were admitted to the bar, sometimes before they were of age; and some of them came to high eminence. The great age of the lawyers in politics began.

"A judiciary made subordinate to the Chief Executive or obliged to follow suggestions from a throne reveals a subjection to arbitrary authority inconsistent with love of individual liberty. A judiciary whose judgments must be made to follow popular clamor and the inconsistency of a mob indicates a people lacking that conserving self-restraint without which popular government is foredoomed to failure."—The Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court.

The pursuit of the elusive vitamin is keeping a lot of people out of other mischief these days. If you get the right vitamins you will be as young and lovely as a millionaire with a new gland, but if you don't you will be prematurely decrepit and in need of detachable teeth. They have just discovered Vitamin D, which makes bone. It is a good thing for the back, but bad for the head. They have not actually netted this rare bird yet, nor any of the others, for that matter, but they infer its existence just as Barnard inferred the fifth satellite of Jupiter before he shook hands with it. has been established commercially, on the basis of popular interest, and folks are eating their yeast raw, drinking more buttermilk than is good for them, and growing thin with fear that they may have missed one of the skittish little devils so necessary to a fair skin, a rosy complexion, and general good health. It does no good to point out to them that if vitamins had never been discovered they would have had no cause to worry about them. They are the folks that enjoy worry. They are the same persons who, a short time ago, chewed their food until they hated it because a gentleman named Fletcher had established the masticating record of the world, and they were afraid they would miss something if they did not follow suit. They are the sort of people that eat eggs for breakfast every morning of their lives and wonder why their disgusted stomachs rebel and have a Boston Tea Party at times. It is dietary fussing, the thing that promotes vegetarian cafeterias. A river of proprietary medicines "said to contain" vitamins is beginning to flood the market, three or four expensive bottles of which probably contain as many of these mysterious compounds as a good salad, a plate of family soup, a dish of spaghetti or a planked steak with vegetables. The truth about these small deer probably is that they are all about us, roosting on every bit of food we eat, nesting abundantly in every slice of bread and every cut of roast beef, and that if a man tried to live very long in this country and board around at the restaurants and hotels or even drag out his existence on home cooking, without getting plenty of them into his system he couldn't do it on a bet. But if any anxious person feels that what is the matter with him is a lack of vitamins, the British Medical Journal calls attention to the fact that he can supply the deficiency by taking cod liver oil. It does not seem to worry the British Medical Journal at all that there are lots of us who would rather die right now and get it over with. A person that had to go through life with the rancid savor of old cod livers forever in his mouth would be more comfortable in the hollow and echoing tomb.

Of course, anything labeled "science" must be received with veneration these days, no matter who may have applied the label. We have an indiscriminating reverence for it, like the Congo savage's fear of the magic remaining in an empty cartridge case. We believe anything a scientist tells us, which is not a bad habit, but in fact a very reasonable one, but we also believe anything a person claiming to be a scientist tells us, without having any way to test his claim. Persons claiming to be scientists have wedged their way into the courts lately with a new department of the black art, called psychopathy, and armed with a whole new vocabulary of such words as "inferiority complex," "border-line mentality," and "mental degenerate." On their dictum and diction a woman convicted in this vicinity of passing fraudulent checks was recently released on five years' probation; the probation law also being "scientific." It was said that the scientists had analyzed her and found that she was impelled to pass bad checks by some one of her many complexes or something and therefore should not be punished. One may be permitted to entertain doubts of the wisdom of such dealing with crime. The complex operating in this particular case was undoubtedly the fact that the woman wanted the money, a theory supported by the additional fact that whenever she wanted money she passed a bad check. That is very simple. And if it results from diseased mentality, it is not likely that five years on probation, with blank checks and pens and ink to be had in every bank, will effect a cure. Special temptations must be offered persons of that character not to commit sin. One of the most effective of such temptations has been found by experience to be the opportunity to remain at large as long as they don't do it, and the likelihood that they can not remain at large if they do. That may not be scientific penology, and persons holding lucrative positions as scientific penologists may be expected to deride it, but it will work. Suppose it be given a trial.

There was a doctor who was "hell on fits." Henceforth Thomas Lee Woolwine is going to be hell on bigamy. Since the Valentino case he has learned that a number of persons contemplate the rash act, and he is going to prevent it if he can, and punish it if he can't. There shall be no more Mexican marriages, no more interloquary brides, no more borderline cases in movie matrimony. Los Angeles is going to be pure. Its fair fame shall not be spotted before the world, its merchants must not be contaminated with bigamony. We venture a prediction: one serious threat to shut off the supply of that same bigamony from the Los Angeles merchants by a withdrawal of the motion-picture industry if bigamy were further prosecuted, and the district attorney's office would get as busy on burglars and pickpockets as a can of blasting powder suddenly raised to the ignition point. And it would be almost right. Bigamy is, of course, an awful thing, and no well-regulated household should have a bigamist in it, but it usually brings its own punishment, and in most cases is too costly to be very generally practiced in this country. Our veneer of civilization is not apt to be nicked seriously by a vice that is so expensive. The crimes against which we really need protection early and often are the lucrative ones.

The worm-hole experts and painters of old masters are having a harvest in London these days out of the pockets of the nouveau riche, the mob of upstarts that made their money from war contracts, and now are busy looking up their long-forgotten ancestors and filling their new-bought mansions in Mayfair with vestiges of former family grandeurs. Elephantine furniture of uncertain design commands their respect and lures their guineas if the legs have enough perforations, and a few grains weight of beetle borings can be found in the corners of the drawers. All this can be supplied; in fact the art is very old, and when it comes to what the Pullman porter's wife called "dis yere puhfumed oak" there are triumphs in delicate and deceptive imitation of antique tables, highboys, even paneling, that look at least as ancient as the days of Cromwell. Portraits are looking up. Cracked and properly yellowed canvases on which appear the caricature of an old man with a wig sell for large sums, and so many are turned out now that the artists have to be careful not to make too many of them look alike. One of these can be hung in the library of a man who did not know who his grandfather was, and perhaps had doubts about his father, and there referred to as "an ancestor of mine, painted, I think, by Van Dyke." It is said that enough of these Van Dykes have been uttered in London since the war to supply canvas for a national merchant marine of windjammers if the paint could be scraped off and the canvases pieced together. As to getting out the records of descent from Norman barons and crusaders, the College of Heralds would have its work cut out for it if it tried to supply the demand. Unfortunately, this ancient institution takes itself seriously, and does not deal in artificially worm-holed pedigrees. So buying ancestral furniture and ancestral portraits is easier, and, moreover, it can be done by a broker, who sees that his clients at least get something for their money though what they get may still reek of the varnish and the glue.

Anatomy as Biography.

One of the strangest of literary relics in England is the skull of Sir Thomas Browne, the author of "Religio Medici," and one of the greatest old masters of English prose, which for nearly eighty years has rested in a glass case in the museum of the Norfolk and Norwich Hospital, writes Jackdaw in John o' London's Weekly. It was taken from Browne's coffin by Robert Fitch, the antiquary, while some repairs were being made in the Church of St. Peter Mancroft, Norwich, to whose vicar it is now going to be handed for reinterment on the site of the original spot in the chancel. Meanwhile, it has been placed in the hands of Sir Arthur Keith, the distinguished anthropologist, for detailed study. His full and final report is not yet issued, but he sends a long preliminary one to the London Times Literary Supplement.

He is convinced that the skull is really that of Browne and that it answers to what he believes to be the best existing portrait. The particularly well-developed temporal lobes answer to some of Browne's most characteristic mental qualities, "the richness and plasticity of his vocabulary, his aptitude for languages, his fondness of music—all qualities which, in the first place, centre round the hearing and that part of the brain which serves this sense." Sir Arthur Keith goes so far as to say that studies like this form the background of true biography, and he expresses the hope that medical men "may win the sympathy of great minds in their desire to elucidate the nature of English genius by doing for them what, I am certain, Sir Thomas Browne would have welcomed having done for himself."

There still exists, if we are to believe the great Canadian explorer, Dugald Campbell, among several peoples of Central and West Africa the judgment by lot, similar in spirit to some of the ordeals practiced in Europe in the Middle Ages. In West Africa any person suspected of an offense has for a certain time to swim in waters infested with crocodiles. If he comes out of the ordeal without injury—and this happens rarely—he is proclaimed innocent. In Central Africa the accused person has to smoke an enormous pipe filled with tobacco and—red peppers. If he succeeds in smoking the contents of the pipe without spitting once—and this, too, happens very rarely—he is freed of all suspicion.

It matters little that one is born in a duck-yard when one has come out of a swan's egg.—Hans Christian Anderson.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

It is a familiar custom for an author of some merit but little fame to get a more celebrated colleague to introduce his book. The custom is sometimes run into the ground. Such an author recently applied to Mr. Bernard Shaw for a preface. Shaw replied: "Swim on your own; don't trust corks."

Brown, who was a newly-made Benedict, looked up his friend Jones, a family man of long experience, and put the question to him: "Jim, what did you call your mother-in-law after you were married?" "Well," replied Jones, "it was this way. For the first year I called her 'Say' and after that we all called her 'Grandma.'"

Sir Walter de Frece is said to be one of the best raconteurs in English clubdom. One of his latest is of the man who accosted another in a West End saloon bar. "Pardon, but you are Dr. Smith, aren't you?" he inquired. The man addressed denied that that was his name. "But, surely," said the first speaker, "you attended my wife?" "I did not," was the answer, "nor am I a doctor." "Then you must have a double!" "Thank you!" said the man; "I will."

Walter Camp, the trainer, was discussing football and its roughness. "One of Yale's roughest players," he said, "went West to work on a ranch. The cowboys, having heard of his reputation, asked him to teach them football. So the man from Yale picked out two husky elevens, explained the rules, and concluded his lecture with, 'If you can't kick the ball, kick an opponent. Now get busy. Where's the ball?' 'Oh, hang the ball,' said a cowboy, 'let's get on with the game.'"

Secretary Mellon recently announced that something must be done to stabilize the world's currency. Apropos of his statement he went on, "A man glided down Fifth Avenue the other day in a marvelous gray racing car with a shining aluminum bonnet. He drew up in front of a friend who said, 'By Jove! What a beautiful car! High-powered, too, I bet!' 'Ninety horsepower,' said the owner. 'Where did you get her?' 'Austria,' was the reply. 'How much?' 'Eight cents.'"

Some time ago Lord Leverhulme bought the small island of Lewis off the coast of Scotland. The new landlord, wishing to improve the lot of its thirty thousand inhabitants, most of whom are small farmers and fishers, had his lawyer draw up a very elaborate contract to be signed by each tenant. It contained twenty-six clauses or stipulations. One old man, according to Lord Leverhulme, returned the contract unsigned and accompanied by this note: "I haven't been able to keep the Ten Commandments for the sake of a mansion in heaven, and I'll be damned if I'll agree to keep twenty-six commandments for a sma' hoose in the island of Lewis."

An Austrian who had gone suddenly insane in 1913 and had been confined in an asylum near Vienna, blissfully ignorant of the war and of the revolution, was recently discharged as cured. To celebrate he hired a cab and had himself driven to the Prater. Upon arrival the cabman demanded eighteen thousand kronen. The cured man paled and grew faint. "This is terrible," he said tremblingly. "I did not dream of such extortion. I've only a twenty-kronen piece with me." The driver stared at the gold coin, but answered honestly enough, "That is all right. You get 18,000 kronen in change." The cured man was terrified. "Here, take it all," he said, "and drive me back to the asylum."

A certain negro during the late war had achieved the rank of orderly to a colonel. In the latter's absence the negro was left in command with the warning to treat his white charges with tact. Sam had assured the colonel that tact was his long suit, but after his chief's departure he looked up a negro friend and told him what his instructions were. "Now," inquired Sam, "what is that tact? I've got to know how to do it." "Well," his friend replied, "I'll explain. When I was back in the states I was wo'kin' at the Waldawf. One day when I was cleanin' up I opened a bathroom doa' and there was a lady in thar sittin' in the bathtub. I shut that doa' just as quick. And I sez, 'Excuse me—suh!' Naow, that 'excuse me' was just politeness, but that 'suh' was tact."

T. R. St.-Johnston, colonial secretary of the Leeward Islands and one time district commissioner in Fiji, writes of his curious experiences in these places in his "South Sea Reminiscences." Apropos of the mistakes made in English on the natives' part, he says: "But if natives misinterpret English words, we, I am sure, are just as frequently led astray by native ones. Like the young lady at her first dinner party after arriving in India, who was somewhat alarmed when the sporting subaltern who had taken her in suddenly said, 'Oh, I must show you my tum-tum after dinner. I have just had it painted black and yellow.' It didn't occur to him that she could be ignorant of the fact that a tum-tum was a dog-cart."

Prohibition Commissioner Haynes is said to be responsible for the following poker story. Of course it had a moral force as told by the commissioner, but we prefer it shorn of its associations. A blue-eyed, innocent-looking young tenderfoot was roped into a crooked poker game in the Tin Can saloon. Of course the newcomer was planted before a mirror so that the barkeeper could read his hand. The game went on in a commonplace way till the bartender signified that the tenderfoot had four aces. Now was the time to skin him. The crooks took their cue and the dealer on the draw dealt the tenderfoot a sixth card, thus nullifying his wonderful hand. Then the betting began and it was fast and furious. In order to befuddle their guest as much as possible drinks and sandwiches were served and the poor tenderfoot ate and raised simultaneously. Suddenly the bartender began to make signs of horror and chagrin. The betting stopped and the crooks called the tenderfoot. He swallowed the last crumb of sandwich, laid down his hand, pocketed the fortune and walked out. After his departure there was a frightful time. "What in tarnation's name," howled the dealer, "what did he do with that sixth card I dealt him? That's what I want to know." "You bonehead!" yelled the bartender. "He ate it with his sandwich!"

THE MERRY MUSE.

A Ballade of Minor/Compensations.

"With its passionate and desperate honesty, this is the frankest and most outspoken book of the season. It burks no issues, either of sex or race." —A publisher's puff of the moment.

Last night upon a latish car I heard
Two sons of toil (and both a trifle tight)
Discuss the case of some one who had erred
With "desperate honesty" (and some delight);
They also "burked no issues," but outright Called spade a spade (and something more at need);
Compelled to hear, this thought relieved my plight—

There are a lot of books I needn't read.

I'm told that Mr. X, whose mighty word
But recently put all historians right,
Has done a sort of guide to risks incurred
By those who like their loves and ladies light;
That Master Y and young Miss Z indite
Some still more frank, outspoken, passionate screed—
Ah, well, however frank and free the flight,
There are a lot of books I needn't read.

The tribe of Tomlinson may newly gird
Their courage for the promised feast (or fight),
But some regard these labels as absurd
And their attractions as distinctly slight;
I can not say they tempt my appetite,
They tend to do the opposite, indeed;
There are some baits one can't be forced to bite
And lots of books (thank God!) one needn't read.

ENVOY.

Prince, when the boomsters flourish in our sight These puffs so "bold," so "frank," so "wholly freed,"

One thought shall still preserve blight:
There are a lot of books we needn't read.
—Lucio in the Manchester Guardian.

The Flight of Migrating Birds.

Professor J. Arthur Thomson, the eminent English biologist, in a recent popular lecture gave some interesting data in regard to the flight of birds, says the Living Age. He corrected erroneous beliefs in regard to the speed with which migrating birds fly, declaring that even the swiftest-winged birds do not exceed fifty miles an hour, and the rate at which migrants travel varies considerably below this. Professor Thomson pointed out the extreme difficulty in securing reliable data, a difficulty for which the habit of flying at night is very largely responsible.

He described also some experiments that have been made with air craft. It has hitherto been believed that migrating birds traveled at great heights, going even as high as ten thousand feet above sea level, but when birds were released from flying machines at such a height, it was found that they were overpowered by the cold and the thinness of the atmosphere. It now seems that cranes and geese, the highest-flying birds, usually travel at about three thousand feet. The highest bird so far observed from air craft is a sky-lark, which was encountered six thousand feet up.

Mr. Vilhjalmur Stefansson brought back with him from the Arctic a quantity of the fine hair of the musk-ox, from which a very good cloth has since been made.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

PERSONAL.

Social Notes.

The engagement of Miss Cornelia Clamptett, daughter of Rev. and Mrs. Frederick W. Clamptett, to Mr. William Shuman, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. E. T. Shuman of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, was announced in San Francisco and in Paris on Wednesday, June 21st. Miss Clamptett made her debut in San Francisco a few years ago, when her father, Rev. Clamptett, was rector of Trinity Episcopal Church. Since then Rev. and Mrs. Clamptett, Miss Cornelia Clamptett, and two of her brothers have made their home in Paris, where Rev. Clamptett is now chaplain of the Students' Club of the American Church. Mr. Shuman graduated from Cornell University in 1918, and is now connected with the Bethlehem Steel Corporation in San Francisco. Miss Clamptett graduated from Miss Burke's school, and during the war served in France in the Red Cross Motor Corps. Two of Miss Clamptett's brothers are in San Francisco, Mr. Donald Clamptett and Mr. Robert Clamptett. Another brother, Mr. Frederick Clamptett, Jr., is in South America. No definite plans for the wedding have yet been made.

Miss Helen Crawford, daughter of Mrs. J. P. Crawford, was married at noon to Dr. Lowell Langstroth at the home of Mr. and Mrs. G. E. McFarland in San Mateo. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Dr. Cambridge of the San Mateo Episcopal Church, on the lawn of the McFarland home, in the presence of relatives and friends. Miss Crawford had no attendants, and was given in marriage by her cousin, Mr. E. M. Murray. Mr. Frank Langstroth was best man for his brother. The wedding breakfast was served under the trees on the lawn, after which Dr. and Mrs. Langstroth left on a short wedding tour. On their return they will make their home in San Francisco.

Miss Genevieve Marion Sanchez, daughter of Mrs. E. M. Sanchez, and Mr. Thomas Brodie Jones, son of Mrs. Eleanor Brodie Jones, of Los Angeles, were married on Tuesday evening, June 20th, at the First Presbyterian Church. Rev. William K. Guthrie officiated. Miss Marion Woodall and Mr. Harry Tipton Steck were the attendants for the bride and groom. Mr. Thomas Wishard, Mr. Landis Sherman, Mr. William Garretson and Mr. Thomas Edwards were the ushers. Following the ceremony, a reception was held in the Gray Room at the Fairmont Hotel.

Miss Louise Mahoney honored Mrs. Constance Beardsley, whose marriage to Mr. Hugh de Haven is to take place on July 3d, at a tea given last Monday. Among Miss Mahoney's guests were Mrs. Mariadna Snell Cobb, Mrs. William K. Morrow, Mrs. Alfred Ehrmann, Mrs. Woodworth Selfridge, Mrs. Wanda Henrici, Mrs. Walter Vodges, Mrs. Reaber, Miss Harriett Jolliffe, Miss Mary Jolliffe and Miss Margaret Bassett.

Miss Elizabeth Schmiedell and her fiancé, Mr. James Moffitt, were the honored guests at a dinner given Thursday evening by Mr. and Mrs. George H. Howard at their home in San Mateo. Mr. and Mrs. Howard's other guests included Mr. and Mrs.

Kenneth McIntosh, Miss Hélène de Latour, Miss Aileen McIntosh, Miss Doris Schmiedell, Miss Mary Emma Flood, Miss Josephine Grant, Miss Mary Julia Crocker, Mr. George Montgomery, Mr. Gordon Hitchcock, Mr. Howard Spreckels, Mr. Robert Hooker, Mr. Coy Filmer, Mr. Cyril McNear, Mr. George Howard and Mr. Henry Howard.

Mrs. Isaac Requa of Piedmont entertained at a reception celebrating her ninety-third birthday on Thursday afternoon at her old home, "The Highlands." Scores of friends called to congratulate Mrs. Requa, who was assisted in receiving her guests by her daughter, Mrs. Oscar Fitzalan Long, and by her granddaughters, Mrs. Charles Zook Sutton, Mrs. Salem Camillo Pohlman and Miss Alice Requa.

Mr. William Shuman, whose engagement to Miss Cornelia Clamptett was announced on Thursday, entertained at a stag dinner party on Friday evening. His guests were Mr. Barroll McNear, Mr. Léon Walker, Mr. Robert Clamptett, Mr. Donald Clamptett, Mr. George Montgomery, Mr. Geoffrey Montgomery, Mr. Jerome Kuhl, Mr. Homer Curran, Mr. Gordon Johnson, Mr. William Magee, Jr., Mr. Alfred Hendrickson, Mr. William Hendrickson, Mr. Wallace Campbell and Mr. Blair Shuman.

Mrs. Jerome Politzer, who until her marriage abroad a year ago was Miss Augusta Foute, was the honor guest at a tea given Saturday by Miss Louise Bullock at her home on Lyon Street. Mr. and Mrs. Politzer returned to San Francisco a week ago and a number of affairs are being planned to welcome them. Dr. Harry Tevis entertained for the Politzers yesterday, having a group of intimate friends for luncheon.

General Charles G. Morton, U. S. A., and his bride are en route to Alaska on their honeymoon. The Mortons, whose marriage occurred in the East, spent a few days at the general's quarters at Fort Scott before going north. They were given a reception Friday afternoon by the officers and their wives from the army posts about the Bay. Several hundred of the service and civilian set paid their compliments to the honor guests. Following the reception Mrs. Florence Porter Pfingst entertained at dinner for General and Mrs. Morton. The affair was given at the Fairmont Hotel.

Miss Edith Bull was the motif for a dinner party given Saturday evening by Mr. and Mrs. Harry Sears Bates at their home in Menlo Park. Forty-five guests were present. Miss Bull recently returned from Europe, after an absence of a welcome for her.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Martin celebrated their twenty-first wedding anniversary on Monday. Contrary to their usual custom, they did not entertain on the occasion, because of the illness of Mrs. Martin's mother, Mrs. Henry T. Scott.

According to Farington, Napoleon, when First Consul, had busts of Nelson and Fox in his rooms at the Tuileries.

A Fairy Went A-Marketing.

A fairy went a-marketing—
She bought a colored bird;
It sang the sweetest, shrillest song
That ever she had heard;
She sat beside its painted cage
And listened half the day,
And then she opened wide the door
And let it fly away.

A fairy went a-marketing—
She bought a winter gown
All stitched about with gossamer
And lined with thistle-down;
She wore it all the afternoon
With prancing and delight,
Then gave it to a little frog
To keep it warm at night.

—Miss Fyelman in "Poems from Punch," 1909-1920.

"Heart and Brain."

(The Genoa Conference.)

Night-founded Heart had lost her ways
Amid long strivings of good will,
Noble endeavors come to nil,
And heaven-high futilities
Pursued in faith, with passion strong
To slay the evil, right the wrong.
Nor wan and weary, faint and spent,
For some new guiding star she gropes;
To light another vision, blent
Of her great will and deathless hopes.

And Brain, grown bitter with the blows
He'd beat upon the vile and base,
Staggered before the iron face
Of huge, unconquered human woes.
He smote and smote and could not see
What lacked his mighty energy,
But marked each stroke deflected sheer
From armed ignorance and greed
That scorned his challenges austere,
Flouted the clarion of his creed.

O generous Heart, O Brain steel-bright,
Foregather, come together, rise,
And dawn shall break upon the night
Of your divided destinies,
To wake the weary soul of earth
Sunk in long impotence and death.
When Reason mounts her empty throne—
For orb and sceptre Heart and Brain—
Mankind shall come into his own
And human Love with Wisdom reign.

—Eden Phillpotts in the Observer.

The Heron.

Solitary, silent at the brown burn's edge,
Bent above the ripple where the shy trout run,
He but sees the wan wave lapping on the sedge—
I can see the bit-bars flashing in the sun.

High and swift above him rush the startled teal,
Gray and close about him lies the mother-mist,
He but sees the round hill rising like a wheel—
I can see a horseman with hawk upon his wrist.

Brown below the heather runs the ripple on his feet,
Low among the shallows there are shadows slipping through,

He but sees the moor-trout mingling as they meet—
I can see the goshawk stooping from the blue.

Now he hears a footstep; wakes a sleeping power;
Wide-winged and wonderful sails away, and slow.

I can see a tall knight 'neath a lady's bower,
Riding with a shorn plume at his saddle-bow.
—Will H. Ogilvie in Westminster Gazette.

At Del Monte.

Golf matches for men and women will be the outstanding sport feature at Del Monte over the Independence Day holiday. There will be horseback riding, swimming, fishing, tennis and other pastimes to furnish diversion to the crowds that will celebrate the glorious Fourth at the Monterey resort. Among some of those who have made reservations at Del Monte are Mr. and Mrs. William Pierce Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. George Keith, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Reiners of Fresno, Mr. and Mrs. E. Clinton Worden, Mr. and Mrs. E. R. Folger, Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Brooks, Alfred Tubbs and party, W. B. Tubbs and party, Mr. and Mrs. Paul T. Carroll, Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Goodfellow, Mr. and Mrs. John Francis Neylan, Mr. Dan Murphy and party.

Horseback riding is very much in favor now with the Pebble Beach residents. Mrs. Jane Selby Haine, who has taken the Flint cottage for the summer, is an expert horsewoman, to whom is due much in stimulating interest in the sport. Mrs. Haine is accompanied in her rides by Mrs. Samuel F. B. Morse, Mrs. Arthur Hill Vincent, and Mrs. Alanson Weeks.

Feather River.

The Feather River Inn opened for the season on June 10th. The new golf course, which was completed June 1, 1921, is in condition and golfers pronounce it one of the best nine-hole courses in California. Peter Soutar, golf professional, is in charge. Horseback riding is one of the great features. Every day from ten to fifteen of the guests go on rides to the different lakes.

Mr. W. H. Metcalfe and family of Oakland are spending a few days at the inn. Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Sultan and family of San Francisco are at the inn, and Mr. and Mrs. E. L. Gunther of San Francisco are spending two weeks there. Mr. D. F. Parker and family of Pasadena have arrived for a stay.

Broke His Own Record.

After serving forty-five years without making a single arrest, a New York policeman, who is seventy-six years of age, recently broke his own record by "running in" a man for disorderly conduct.

The "cod liver oil man" has just made his appearance in the streets of Moscow, much to the delight of the day nurseries and children's homes, though possibly not to the patients themselves, says the New York Tribune. At first sight one might mistake him for the once familiar milkman, for he drives round daily a huge cask mounted on a truck. The authorities are not on the lookout for him, so he has no need to carry his wares. They come to him carrying pails which he places under the spigot. He opens it, lets it run until the pail is sufficiently filled with the cod liver oil, and when all the pails are treated in the same way drives off, no mention being made of payment. Sixty day nurseries and seventeen children's homes were supplied with the oil in this way in three days, said the cable acquainting the London office of the American Relief Administration with this new fashion of distributing doses. Medicines and other supplies are also being distributed in the same way. The American Relief Administration in Russia is distributing $7,600,000 worth of medical supplies in Russia.

One of the most interesting pieces of historic china in the valuable collection which the National Museum has been gathering for more than thirty years is the deep cream salad bowl in the centre of the miscellaneous Washington memorials. This bowl is the sole survival of the handsome dinner service presented in the summer of 1782 to General and Lady Washington, as the term went then, by some officers of the Saintonge regiment, encamped near Williamsburg. One of these gentlemen, M. de Bellegarde, was proprietor of a porcelain manufactory at Niderviller, near Phalsbourg. The service was designed especially for the purpose, and, according to the diary of the Baron Closen, one of the officers in attendance, "on July 14th, M. de Bellegarde presented a porcelain service of great beauty and the newest taste, and Lady Washington was delighted with the attention and most gracefully expressed her thanks."

If a man would pursue philosophy, his first task is to throw away conceit. For it is impossible for a man to learn what he has a conceit that he already knows.—Epictetus.

BERZELIUS AND CHEMISTRY.

The resolution of chemical compounds into their elements, and the establishment of the elements themselves, from the days of Boyle on, had been on a qualitative basis. Where the atomic proportions had been fixed for compounds, they had been arrived at empirically, and were merely simple arithmetical aliquot parts, says the General Chemical Bulletin. The lack of exact experimental evidence had held back the general adoption of Dalton's theory. Jöns Jacob Berzelius, the great Swedish chemist, inaugurated the quantitative, that is, the modern, theory of chemistry, as distinguished from the qualitative foundations of his predecessors. The general recognition of the atomic theory followed on his researches.

Berzelius was born on August 20, 1776, at Väfrersunda, Sweden. His father, who was principal of a school, died when Berzelius was four years old; and his mother was married a second time to Anders Ekmark, the German pastor at Nörköping. His stepfather sympathized with Berzelius' love for natural science and encouraged him in his pursuits. His education was in a way rather haphazard, but he came under the influence of the entomologist and botanist Haglund, who was his tutor and later on under that of Hornstedt, the natural history teacher at the Linköping gymnasium. In 1798, at the age of twenty-two, he passed the medico-philosophical examination at the great University of Upsala, although he knew but little chemistry. It was after his graduation that he began chemical experiments in conjunction with his oldest half-brother. From then on, chemistry was his recreation from his other studies, although with little encouragement. After much work, he received his degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1802. With Von Hisinger, about 1806, he published his first work on the chemical action of the Voltaic pile, then just known, which contains an expression of the views which formed the basis of Berzelius' theory of chemical combination. With Hisinger, he discovered and correctly described the element cerium. Meantime he continued his analytical experiments until he received an appointment in chemistry at the Karlberg Military Academy, and in 1807 was appointed professor at the School of Surgery at Stockholm, where he was able to carry on his pharmaceutical and chemical work, aided by a state grant of money for instruments and materials. At this time he wrote a text book of chemistry, his work on which was the starting point of the researches on chemical proportions which became his life-work. From now on, his work became more varied and grew in importance. He corresponded with and visited the principal chemists of Europe. In 1812 he was appointed by the King of Sweden director of the newly-established Academy of Agriculture. In 1813 he published a small treatise on chemical mineralogy, soon translated into English and German. His recognition as one of Europe's leading scientists was now universal, and professorships and other scientific honors flowed in to him. In 1835 he married, and was elevated to the peerage. He continued active till his death in 1848, at the age of seventy-two.

Berzelius, among many other things, devised our current chemical symbols for the atoms. By his study of the composition of the oxides and sulphides of metals and non-metals he placed on a firm basis the chemical law of multiple proportions.

Berzelius, like the great Alexander Agassiz, was not alone a great scientific intellect, but he also exerted a vast influence as a teacher and formed many distinguished chemists through instruction in his laboratory, instruction which could not be obtained elsewhere. His tremendous industry and single-minded devotion to science enabled him to overcome the handicap of a meagre early education. Like all the great names in science, he had to lay the very foundations of his chosen work. His own energy carried him to eminence.

A German medical journal reports that a girl in Frankfurt while eating a blood orange was wounded by the broken point of an injection syringe which still contained a small quantity of red aniline color. The girl had bought a dozen oranges. They were examined, and it was found that they all had been injected with red of the same nature. It seems that this proceeding is not new, and that in Germany—and perhaps elsewhere—the chemical transformation of ordinary oranges into blood oranges has been often performed. The chapter of falsification will never be finished.

The Public and the Railway Strike.

The superintendent of the Southern Pacific Railroad told the striking shopmen their strike was against the government, not the company, inasmuch as the Railroad Labor Board was the government under the law; and said: "The findings of the Board will be upheld by public opinion. Your salaried leaders and their families will not suffer the loss and privations that will come to most of the rank and file who fail to return to the service, and those who are dear to them." He might better have said that the findings of the Board ought to be upheld by public opinion; for no one can tell in advance these troubled days just what form public opinion will take, or on what faction it will set its approval. It is not always rational; it is frequently fickle and mistaken about its own interests. At times it seems to want things settled promptly rather than properly, and this may be one of the times. Yet there is no certainty that it is. One would suppose the public was surfeited with industrial turmoil, especially as the general railway strike, or threat of it, has assumed a seasonal aspect. Each summer seems to bring it to the fore, no matter what the general conditions may be; and that has an arbitrary appearance which is apt to strain the popular patience to failure, as the engineers would put it. In this case the Railroad Labor Board appears to have a clean record of impartiality, for which the shopmen have given it no credit. It raised wages when that was necessary, and now that it seems necessary to reduce them the men refuse to accept its decision. That decision is based, moreover, on as good a foundation of justice as we are likely to have in affairs so complex and human. The proposed wage scale was carefully calculated so that the men should have as much purchasing power in their reduced pay as they had before the European war broke out. They would not be so well off as they are today, but every class of society has to retrench, in order to get back to that "normalcy" of which we have heard so much and seen so little. The railroads must be restored to efficiency in order that they may do the work necessary to get us back on a secure basis of business and life, which means that lowering of wages is absolutely necessary. The board's decision appears to have been a moderate and considerate one, and the public ought to appreciate it and make the men understand that the decision has the full power of popular support. It is in the public interest, and unless the public recognizes that fact, it will continue to suffer all the economic troubles that beset it now.

The Case of Senator Myers.

One more good man is to become a sacrifice to the breakdown of party responsibility through popular nomination, that abracadabra for producing the magical millennium. Henry Lee Myers, Senator from Montana, has announced that he will not enter the contest for renomination. He has offended the reds, the pinks, and the radicals of his state, which it would be necessary, in these times, for any man to do that was worth one congressional package of free seeds; and that makes it necessary for him, if he is to continue in public life, to face a campaign of misrepresentation, villification, and indiscriminate popular abuse of every sort. Myers won't do it, and nobody can blame him. But he will be a loss to the country when his present term in the Senate expires.

This is the man that had the courage to denounce the Illinois labor murders in the Senate chamber the other day while Borah was uttering the usual drool about "curing the evils which bring on such awful crimes." It was Myers who said:

There is no free America, and there never will be any free America until an American citizen or an American resident who wants to work and earn an honest living can seek and obtain honest work and perform that work in peace, without getting the consent of an invisible government, a self-constituted superior power, superior to human rights, superior to the Government.

There can be no free America until an American citizen or denizen can work at his calling or trade without having first to get the consent of an organized minority, a power which is more tyrannical and more domineering than anything else that has ever exercised tyranny and dominating power in this country; without having to get the consent to work of anybody or any organization other than himself and his employer. That is what free America should mean. * * *

To many thousands, hundreds of thousands of our humblest but most deserving citizens the inestimable right to work when and where and for whom they please, without the consent or approval of anybody else, is denied. So long as that may be the case this will not be free America, the "land of liberty." When such awful things as the horrible crime of which I have been talking can happen it is not free America. These men who were so brutally killed did not enjoy the benefits of free America. They were deprived of their lives, when pursuing their rights, by lawless acts that defy free America and make a farce of it.

Those lawless acts were the result of the dominance of an organized minority, and I say that the domination of an organized minority is the greatest menace that confronts the American people today. Those acts were the result of the power of an organized minority, and that organized minority, through higher officials of the organized minority, and in peaceful and more gentle but none the less effective ways, can come to Congress and get nearly anything it wants, from my observation, by peacefully and silently, but nevertheless quite effectively, swinging a club over the head of Congress or shaking a mailed fist in its face. In my opinion, legislation at the behest of organized minorities is seriously threatening the life and stability of this Government. I do not confine that remark to the organized minority of which I started out to speaking. I refer to all organized minorities, of which there are many. I have heard it asserted by people who have made a study of the subject that seventy per cent of American legislation enacted by Congress or by State legislatures is enacted at the behest of organized minorities, and I do not doubt it.

And when Senator Walsh of Massachusetts asked for the suggestion of a remedy, Myers became even more offensive. He had the effrontery to reply:

Backbone in public men! That is the only effective remedy of which I know. I do not think there is much of it in public life today, but I hope there may be more in future. I believe that legislation enacted at the behest of organized minorities is a grave menace to this country today. It is seriously threatening the life and stability of this Government, and unless it is stopped no man can tell the end or foresee the result, except that I believe it will be disaster of the gravest kind; and unless outrages of the kind to which I have referred this morning are stopped by an aroused public sentiment, as reflected in halls of legislation, the country will go all the more speedily to inevitable disaster. Both legislative and executive officials should take sharp notice of the dangers that beset us.

Here is recognition, full and complete, of the bloc system in Congress that has been plaguing the President and bringing legislation into more than common disrepute during this session. That system comes from organized minorities, and organized minorities are enabled to control because the old lines of party responsibility have been weakened. Transient gusts of popular passion have been substituted for the careful study of conditions, and policies to meet them, by party managers checked by the knowledge that unless they did meet the country's problems fairly and solve them well the opposition would turn their party out by doing better and proving that it was better. We have King Stork in place of King Log, and he is a worse king. We have no idea how general appreciation of such a fact may influence our history. When the frogs in the fable found it out it was too late—they had been devoured. And humanity is long learning that old lesson.

The loss of Myers will be a tragedy. He is a sound lawyer, a deep student of government, and the possessor of an intelligence above the Senate average. He certainly has the backbone which he rightly says is the remedy against government by organized and clamorous minorities. In 1920 the Non-Partisan League moved into Montana from North Dakota, as it has moved into California recently, and captured the Democratic state organization. Myers is a Democrat. He promptly denounced the Democratic ticket as misrepresentative, and declared the nominees were nothing but Non-Partisan Leaguers and Socialists, in disguise; and he advised the honest Democrats of Montana to go to the polls and vote the Republican ticket. Then he went back to Montana and stumped the state and saved it from the fate of North Dakota. Naturally he offended the radicals and the Democratic partisans, and they are getting ready to throw him out; and Myers feels that it is not worth while to combat them in his own interest though it was well worth while to combat them in the interest of Montana and of good American government. The people who clamored for the destruction of party control now have a chance to see how that particular patent medicine can be made to work. It eliminates from Congress one of the men Congress and the country at large can least easily spare, and one who has given the best evidence of ability to rise above partisan influences.

There is no real cure for political evils except in the character of the men we elect to office. And the method of nomination by an uninformed public from a lot of self-seeking persons responsible to no party but responsive merely to the mob, can hardly be called an improvement over the two-party system under which the possibilities were so reduced that the majority could make intelligent choice between them. The prospect held out to us by the popular election of senators is not a pleasant one. Unless the public can be better educated in the fundamentals of government than it is at present we are going to suffer from cirrhosis of the Senate.

The Drift of the University.

The Argonaut would be lacking in candor and character if it failed to acknowledge the communication from Dr. Barrows, president of the University of California, published in last week's issue. It is gratified that the relations subsisting between Dr. Barrows and the Regents, and between Dr. Barrows and the Academic Senate, are no worse than he says, and it has no disposition to question his statement of the matter.

But, although Dr. Barrows' relations with the Regents and Academic Senate may be satisfactory, they are a minor matter by comparison with the general atmosphere and spirit of the University. That has not been satisfactory for a long time, and the president's letter is confirmatory of much that we have said of it. "As to the proper aims of the University," he says, "there may be little difference of opinion between us. No one here would, I think, express content with the standards of present day scholarship. Low public tastes have penetrated academic campuses. Nevertheless, your indictment of the University seems to me very severe and to disregard the fine devotion and wholesome behavior which appear to me to predominate."

Perhaps the concluding sentence of that quotation is true, but the Argonaut does not think so. The general looseness of method and confusion of aim apparent in the student body, together with certain phases of undergraduate life more sinister still, must proceed in the last analysis from the conditions made or permitted for it. The institution appears to be in some part pervaded by a vague and wandering latitudinarianism, which, proceeding from the elective system instituted about twenty-eight years ago and confirmed in this generation by the break-down of restraint caused by the war, has missed the opportunity to develop discipline and character which is the main mission of any valuable educational institution.

These are days, if ever there were such days, when standards of conduct and performance need upholding with all the strength of organized society. The world is literally running "on the loose," as the English say. We have not yet recovered from the deep disturbances of the war, and shall not until people in general are willing to submit themselves to discipline, the exactions of ordered industry and the requirements of social life. Such discipline does not come from continuous excitements and indulgences, from joy rides and petting parties and from wasting a good part of a semester dancing to saxophones and Chinese trumpets, on the understanding that there are plenty of snap courses from which enough credits can be made up during the summer session to get the dancers through to their degrees. It does not come from a general acceptance of the opinion that girls may properly forsake the conventions of modesty to which their mothers conformed, and do a lot of so-called "classic" or "Greek" dancing, which would certainly amuse any classic Greek, in one-piece costumes and with bare legs, and have their photographs taken in that state for publication in a newspaper, under the mistaken idea, and here is part of the real tragedy of it, that they are thereby spreading grace and beauty in the world.

It seems generally admitted that there are too many courses and too many students at Berkeley. The entrance requirements are sadly low. And there is too much extension work. If all the extension courses were really needed or served good purposes, none of them would have to be advertised on bill boards with advertisements for palmolive soap, and cut plug tobacco, and the "educational" motion pictures of Harold Lloyd and Larry Semon. This popularizing and advertising tendency must look quite strange to our foreign critics. Nor has the time arrived when we can afford to say academically "What do we care for abroad?" Undoubtedly there is much of what Dr. Barrows has designated as fine devotion and wholesome behavior. But there is also much of the superficial, the extraneous, the parasitical and the tawdry, and a relaxation of social sanctions which in its concrete manifestations may well excite concern. In Dr. Barrows' language, low public tastes have penetrated the campus.

It is because it values the University beyond any institution in the state that the Argonaut has sought to point out such things as these, even at the cost of some possible embarrassment to the University's president. The Argonaut's criticism was constructive, and serviceable, and it remains true in the main, after all is said and done about the relations of the President, the Academic Senate and the Regents. Moreover, it is doing good. As we observed two weeks ago, the student body has been seriously taking account of its responsibilities for the immeasurable opportunities of youth. It does not wish to see its alma mater embarked upon a descending course. It is giving real thought to its own part in the lowering of academic standards, and it will, we believe, exert its influence in salutary ways for the future. But it will need to do more thinking still.

The Locks of Samson.

In a short time there will be left in the United States no relief from hard work and sorrow except playing mumbly peg. And a paternalistic Congress will compel us to sprinkle listerine on the soil from which the loser pulls the peg, and will prohibit the use of sharp knives for fear we shall cut our fingers. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle has given vent to an almost inexhaustible stock of nonsense lately, but he said one true thing as he departed for England, and that was that there is too much grandmothering done to the people of this country. He was right, for once. Now Wade Ellis, a Washington and Cincinnati lawyer, who was once an assistant to the Attorney-General, says that the American Bar Association will recommend that Congress prohibit the manufacture of firearms and ammunition except for military and police uses.

We are at a loss to understand what malignant henbane has got into the American people to make them tolerant of the recurrent proposal to pass such an un-American restriction. The Constitution says that "the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed"; but we are infringing it all over this country, and have been for generations, in all our police-dictated ordinances against concealed weapons; and the courts have upheld them. They are of little use. They disarm every man who is disposed to observe the law, and leave him at the mercy of crooks and thugs who pay no attention to it. In New York they have a ridiculous hypertrophied growth of the common concealed-weapons ordinance known as the Sullivan Act, prohibiting the purchase of weapons and even the keeping of a revolver in one's own house without a license. So the thugs send to mail-order houses in other states and get all the weapons they want, hire gun-bearers, like hunters in Africa, to follow them around and hand them their guns when they have their victims where they want them, and when the evening's hunt is over check them at some convenient pool hall ready for tomorrow. And the police can do nothing effective about it, and never can, because they can not tell what the crook is going to do next. In his war on society the crook always has the strategic advantage that military sharps tell us lies with the attacking side. And by such laws the citizen is robbed of his liberty and his defense at one and the same time. The Sullivan law has not stopped crime. We do not suggest repealing the ordinary concealed-weapons ordinance. We rub along with it somehow, unconstitutional though it may be, and the police need all the help they can get. But this goes too far.

The manufacture of firearms is one of the great American arts. We have beaten the world in cheap stock production. A low-cost rifle is almost the right and heritage of every American boy with a real American father. And there is something about the sport of rifle shooting that promotes fraternal regard among neighbors, elevation of character, and a sporting sense of justice. It is a great schooling in precision of method—better than most manual training. For generations Americans led every part of the world except Switzerland in close shooting with the rifle, and last year our team at Lyons took the world's championship from the Swiss. Our aptitude at it has almost been a gift, and what it has contributed to the national defense is known to but a few students of the subject, because our book-bound historians have concerned themselves with far less important things. We don't have to go back to the days of Andrew Jackson and General Packenham to see it in operation. We have the recent case of Sergeant Alvin York, who never would have come out of his great adventure alive if he hadn't been a good shot, trained in boyhood by his father with the American rifle the manufacture of which the American Bar Association is said to be getting ready to suppress. In our recent resistance to Prussian tyranny the precision of our rifle fire astonished our allies and did worse than that to our foes. One American company repelled five charges of Prussian shock troops, with the loss of hardly a man, and, after the engagement, buried more than 600 Germans in front of its position. This world-saving slaughter was not done with machine-guns or artillery, but with the rifle, and largely because the Americans were accustomed to the use of guns from boyhood. You can't make good rifle shots in a few months of training. If we are to meddle at all with the firearms industry we should subsidize it instead of suppressing it. It is vital to the national defense. But we do not need to meddle with it at all. It can beautifully take care of itself without any grandmothering.

This is merely one phase of a far more general struggle between two world-old ideas—between American individualism and the German effort to make the individual the puppet of the state. That struggle is at least as old as the day the Greeks saved their liberties from the Persians at the battle of Marathon. Governmental meddling with private life is an Asiatic policy. Under the general disposition of long-haired idealists to have everything regulated by law it is growing in this country at a terrible rate. Unless we stop it we shall live to see most of the spontaneity killed out of American life, and only a few persons will understand what it was that paralyzed us.

Compulsory Competition.

Competition has been so long a shibboleth with Americans that it has acquired an undeserved veneration. At one time in our history, and not so far back either, it seemed necessary to the protection of the consumer. Parents taught their children that "competition is the life of trade." And the children grew up to suppose that, for some mysterious and terrible reason, without competition we should all be robbed poor. Under the extension of the dubious principle of governmental meddling, competition became a sort of trust of some of our official institutions. It was felt that it must be preserved at all costs, but we now know that a great many times it cost us more than it was worth. Government monopolies in the necessities of life are a form of tyranny and oppression. But monopolies that are attained through superiority of commercial service and the elimination of competitors unfit or unqualified to give the public what it requires are not necessarily villainous. In most cases without the protection of competition the public is sufficiently protected by the commercial sagacity of the monopolists themselves, who understand that in order to make their product they must sell it, and in order to sell it they must make a price that the public can afford to pay. These remarks are, of course, very general and may not be true in all specific instances, but we believe them to be true of most of the large transactions of American commerce and industry. And they assume for argument's sake that there are monopolies of that nature. The United States Steel Corporation had no difficulty proving it was not one, and we have no doubt that many other supposed monopolies are no nearer being real ones than the Steel Corporation.

Compulsory competition is not likely to work very much better than royal monopoly. It is sure to involve excessive costs, which the public will pay without knowing it. Large parts of California and the Pacific Coast are today threatened with an effort to impose compulsory competition. We say with an effort to impose it, because if the unmerging decision of the Supreme Court is permitted to become operative the competition will be more of a legal fiction than a reality; for the diversion of Central Pacific business from the Southern Pacific to the Union Pacific with its Salt Lake-Los Angeles connection would financially cripple the Southern Pacific to such a degree that it would probably be reduced to inefficiency—as a competitor, at least in the California field.

Compulsory competition can never be more than a clumsy effort at creating heaven upon earth and can never be expected to work better than in the prospective manner we have outlined. Under the Transportation Act of 1920 it is contemplated that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall evolve plans for the consolidation of the railroads of the country into a limited number of systems to be operated as units, just as the Southern Pacific-Central Pacific systems have been operated for the past fifty years. In deference to our old prejudices in favor of competition, it is required that in any such consolidations competition shall be preserved. But under the circumstances of this case it must seriously be questioned whether disrupting the Southern Pacific-Central Pacific system in order to create a Central Pacific-Union Pacific system is promoting competition or is not actually destroying competition in an effective sense in this territory. Professor Ripley, philosopher, counsel and friend to the commission, has imagined an ideal plan which includes the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific in one system, and he evidently entertains the opinion that he will be promoting the transportation needs of this territory by such a grouping. Professor Ripley knows a great deal about railroading—on paper. But he is an idealist. We doubt if his information as to traffic needs, train operation, terminals, and the connecting links of the amazing network of lines that make up the transportation system of California is of the commercially practical kind. The commission should pay some heed to the intelligent opinion of California shippers and organizations of California business men and such practical experts in railroading as Max Thelen, former president of the California state railroad commission, who declared before the Commonwealth Club the other day that "the dismemberment of the Southern Pacific system would be a public calamity to the people of California."

There are those in California who support the recent decision, and wish the unscrambling to proceed. They appear to have some connection with Union Pacific and Western Pacific interests. The Union Pacific would certainly gain by a severance of present relations between the Central and Southern Pacific lines, and perhaps the Western Pacific would expect some relief from having the competition of the Union Pacific-Central Pacific system substituted for that of the Southern Pacific-Central Pacific system—much as a man with a boil on his neck wishes it could be transplanted to some other part of his person. But the people of California would gain nothing by the shift. They can only lose.

Editorial Notes.

Following on the assassinations of Erzberger and Rathenau, the effort to assassinate Maximilian Harden, Germany's great Jewish editor, identifies German monarchism with the most vicious tendencies of that country; and it is growing. Harden is one of the constructive journalists of Europe, but the pan-Germans and imperialists could not stand his efforts to make his readers see the truth. The suppression of truth is the certain stigma of an evil cause.

Communism and capitalism won't mix, either at Genoa, the Hague, or Moscow. If Lloyd George were a better economist he would know that. Hughes, Hoover, and Harding know it, and are making no effort at such a mistake, either at Washington or in Europe. Their stand on the Russian business has saved the United States from descending to the ridiculous.

The foremost thought in the Constitution is the right to freedom and the pursuit of happiness. Men must be free to live and to achieve. Liberty is gone in America when any man is denied by anybody the right to work and live by that work. It does not matter who denies. A free American has the right to labor without any other's leave. It would be no less an abridgment to deny men the right to bargain collectively. Governments cannot tolerate any class or grouped domination through force. It will be a sorry day when group domination is reflected in our laws. Government, and the laws which government is charged with enforcing, must be for all the people, ever aiming at the common good.—President Warren G. Harding, in his Independence Day address at Marion, O.

Arthur E. Stillwell, president of several railroads, says the spirits told him where to build his lines and terminals. If that is the general practice it may explain why it takes a box-car twenty-one days to creep across the city of Toledo.

On the condition of the motion pictures the New York Times says: "No censorship and no uplift board can plant brains where only bone will grow." And that is true of more than movies.

The girls will stop using lip sticks and powder puffs just as soon as the fruit packers stop putting the best cherries on the top of the box.

Fits of Legislation.

OAKLAND, June 24, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Your admirable editorial on La Follette's attacking the Supreme Court might well have gone much further. All men know, if they wish to know, that in fact the courts of last resort in this country have strained the Constitution to uphold bad laws many times for once that they have done the opposite. It is a common thing for legislation to include some provision or be addressed to some other than its real object with design that the constitutional limitations be evaded thereby. It is a common thing to enact bad or concededly invalid laws, because they are momentarily popular, and "pass the buck" to the courts.

We have an example of this in the Southern Pacific case. Twenty years ago and less it was good politics to smash the Southern Pacific. It has been smashed judicially in obedience to the law enacted by Congress—at least we must accept that as the law—and now we have to hear the lamentations of the political sons of the smashers damning the Supreme Court for it. Why do they lament when it is coming to pass as they wished?

Yours very truly,

GEORGE F. LONGSDORF.

An Appreciation.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., June 28, 1922.

Mr. W. J. Funk, Vice Pres., The Literary Digest, 354-360 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

My Dear Sir:—My subscription for both the Literary Digest and Argonaut was placed through the W. K. Stewart Co., and they understand that the subscription to both papers is to be continued as I look upon them as the best weeklies that I have ever seen. I can not imagine my subscription to either ever being discontinued.

From my point of view, Mr. Holman is a bit radical in his political views, and yet, his editorials are so brilliant and entertaining that it is easy to forget the things in which you do not agree with him.

I know the Pacific Coast well enough to know that he is doing a wonderful and courageous work in his criticisms on the management of the University of California.

Thanking you for your interesting letter and assuring you that I have no idea of discontinuing my subscription to the Literary Digest, believe me to be,

Sincerely yours,

A. J. S. HOLT.

National Modesty.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 20, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Don't let us repeat continually that we are the most witty, most intelligent, and the foremost people in the world. This affirmation, coming from ourselves, has no value. It is simply a manifestation of pride, one of the many forms under which self-conceit presents itself; it is besides, so assure us the philosophers, one of the symbols of the self-preservation extinct. Vanity is one of its expressions and is manifested in divers ways having for object to conceive a very high opinion of oneself; but in reality does it suffice that we should continually repeat that we are the first nation in the world, to make the assertion a fact and a truth, besides endeavoring to get others to admit and believe it? Not alone, is it not so, but we should perhaps even contemplate such a claim as a decided proof of barbarity. It is indeed easy to establish that all barbarians, all savage and primitive peoples, as also those of recent development, have been, or are, characterized by an overflow of juvenile vanity. Without taking from the Bible the hypertrophy of the impudent and rude haughtiness which characterized the smallest and lowest selected people of Jahveh, we are aware that the Aryans named themselves "The Pure," "The Noble"; all the foreigners were "The Dasyous," that is to say: brigands!

The barbarians that populated Japan at the prehistoric period and who to this day inhabit the northern part of the island of Yezo, name themselves "Ainos," "The Men," as they consider themselves preeminently the only ones worthy of that name. D'Arbois de Jubainville tells us that in the time of the Gauls, the inhabitants of the district of Bourges named themselves "The Bituriges," that is to say: "Always Kings." The same author states further that "Teutoni" signifies simply: "The Kings." We can thereby see that "Deutschland ueber Alles" comes to us from afar. Truly there is no people or tribe, even of the lowest level, which does not consider itself superior to the rest of humanity. The Hottentots, name given them by the Europeans, name themselves "Koi-Koin," which means in their language "Men of Men."

Peoples are like children. Each of them considers itself the centre of the world! The Peruvians had named their capital "Cuzco," "The Umbilicus of the world," which is the sense of the word "Cococo" in the Quechua language. The Chinese name their country "The Middle Empire." Primitive, and even civilized people, show the same tendency, the propensity of self-conceit.

Translated from the French. No doubt addressed to whomsoever it may concern.

The recent disorders in Ireland have not materially affected the vital statistics of that country. In 1920 the death rate was the lowest ever recorded, and the marriage rate the highest since 1864. There was also an increase in the birth rate. Of the deaths, eighty-five were of persons of 100 years old and over, and 415 of persons ninety-five years old and upwards.

REMARRIAGE IN FRANCE.

How Long Delays After Widowhood and Divorce Affect the Birth Rate.

(Translated for the Argonaut, from Le Journal, Paris.)

Statisticians, scrupulously fussy people but exact, call our attention to the fact that the census of our population shows that the number of French people is growing less each day. After a brief flourishing period, born of emotion, of surprise and joy in finding ourselves intact in spite of the many perils gone through, here we are again, as before the war, bound by a restricted birth rate, while Germany sees her population replenish itself with more rapidity than ever, in keeping with the course, for an instant suspended, of her upward movement.

We have advocated various measures, of which the most decorative, if not the most effective, was the creation of a beautiful medal, solemnly offered by public munificence to the mother of eight children; the perfect idea of a natural gift. It does not seem, however, if we believe recent statistics, that ambition to display a silver medal on their breasts has encouraged many ladies to impose upon themselves supplementary maternal cares. Evidently this fashion of the treatment of sterility by numismatics has gone out of vogue.

What concerns us now is that the marriage code, instead of favoring marriage, hinders it.

Divorce, cruel remedy of unhappy situations, figures in our laws concurrently with the physical separation (legal separation) which is a sort of matrimonial celibacy. The legislator of 1884-1886 was forced to reconcile two very different attitudes of mind. One idea was to grant absolute divorce, once the physical separation was established; the other, that of the partisans of the indissolubility of marriage, who wished to maintain the term imposed for physical (legal) separation. However, a compromise was adopted as follows: The physical separation term was retained; at the same time it was made lawful for either of the separated couple to demand an absolute divorce after a period of three years. A certain term of probation was thus inflicted upon the separated couple, to provide for a possible reconciliation.

The argument is strong. But is it necessary to maintain, during so long a period as three years, in view of a problematical reconciliation, this odd state, which, without their being either married or divorced, leaves the separated couple without a home, although still bound to the conjugal tie? What interest can society have in the prolongation of so dangerous a situation, full of perils for each?

Such delay is excessive, above all in a country justifiably disturbed over the diminution of its birth rate, and which should facilitate as much as possible conditions tending to marriage. It is therefore proposed to the Senate to shorten by one year this term of probation. When two years have passed away without having brought the reconciliation hoped for, it is hardly probable that it will ever be affected. Further, nothing can prevent divorced couples from becoming reconciled and remarrying, yet there are examples where, according to the code, these reconciliations would be legally hindered. However, it is necessary to take all the marriage code article by article for reconsideration, for it is in many respects paradoxical and reminds one of the famous saying: "Marry, and you will do well; do not marry and you will do better!" What advice from a legislator!

As regards the delay in case of widowhood. We know that the widow as well as the divorced woman must wait ten months before marrying again. The reason for this restriction, which comes down to us from Roman law, is excellent. It is wished by this, to put it frankly, to determine the matter of paternity. That is to say, that if the woman were to remarry too soon and become a mother, there would be a question as to the father of the child.

It is not so long since the period of delay in this respect as to divorced women was in certain cases twenty months instead of ten. We have had the honor to advocate, since 1901, a reform which has been realized, and the situation concerning divorce has been modified. The question of delay has therefore lost a little of its importance as to the divorced woman. It is still the same for widows. But why, when it is determined that there is no possibility as to the question of paternity entering into the case, uphold a useless law and one which hinders marriages? When a woman, divorced or widowed, becomes a mother shortly after the dissolution of her marriage, there can be no question as to the paternity of her child; then why impose a delay of ten months before remarriage, which is not justifiable in such a case?

Also, when a divorced couple wish to remarry, as has happened, why impose a delay for any reason whatever? Why not permit the woman to make application to the courts, submitting the circumstances in due form, and, if the judge is satisfied after considering all the findings in the case that there can be no confusion as to paternity, shorten the term of delay before remarriage, there being no justification in fact for the full term in the law?

These are the considerations which have caused us, from October 17, 1919, to propose a law as follows: "The delay of widowhood imposed by Articles 228 and 296 of the Civil Code shall end in the case of the birth of a child. The judge shall have the right to shorten the delay when it is determined that there is no possibility that the woman will become a mother of which the separated husband is the father, or when divorced couples wish to remarry."

Are we willing to make a change? Perhaps. We would nevertheless remark to those who would reproach us that we would limit ourselves in this respect to the Swiss Civil Code, promulgated in 1908. Italy and Roumania, without going as far as that, are engaged in the same task, desiring above all to favor marriages. Only France, so greatly affected by decreasing population, has done nothing in this respect. We may have at least the disposition to see the dangers and apply ourselves seriously to the remedies.

Senator from the Var.

VOICES FROM THE PRESS.

LEWIS'S INFLAMING CHARGE.

(New York Tribune.)

The charge of John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, that "sinister influences have for some time been at work among our membership (the miners' union) to incite and inflame the spirit of violence" requires explanation. Taken with the rest of Mr. Lewis's statement it is obviously meant to give the impression that agents-provocateurs of the owners were responsible for the Illinois slaughter.

This loose claim will be appealing to his supporters and will doubtless do little to quench the flames of hatred now aroused. What proof has Mr. Lewis? If he has knowledge of such agents provoking the Illinois massacre it is his duty to inform the public in full, instead of uttering inflammatory generalities that not only contribute nothing to a solution but mislead his followers.

But, even supposing that Mr. Lewis could furnish such proof, would this in any way justify the assault on the mine and the atrocities that followed? What if the mine workers were but "scabs" and the mine guards were, as The Call describes them, merely "thugs" and "dirty creatures"? Is this a justification for murdering them? What if the mine guards, when they saw the mob approaching, prepared to resist? Was this a cause for subjecting them to unbelievable atrocities?

The facts are becoming clear, despite the smoke screen being thrown out by the advocates of murder in place of law. These are that the striking miners took the law into their own hands and proceeded to murder the hated mine guards and strike-breakers. In so doing they apparently had the sympathy of most of their striking brethren.

There is no surer way to injure a cause. Whatever their grievance, strikers are not justified in a resort to barbarous slaughter to settle it. They have written a bloody chapter in the history of unionism, which can not but prejudice the public against their methods. The right to strike does not imply the right to murder strike-breakers.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE.

(New York Times.)

The Philippine parliamentary mission could not have been surprised to hear from President Harding that "the time is not yet for independence." A month ago Secretary Weeks said, in a statement made to prepare the delegates for the inevitable, that he was not in favor of granting immediate independence to the Filipinos. "The President is not," he added. About the same time Mr. Weeks cabled to Governor General Wood:

"The President and I greatly appreciate your useful work, and both feel that you ought to remain until December. Our preference is to have you serve indefinitely."

Leonard Wood was sent to Manila to correct some disturbing mistakes of native government, to restore the standards of the former American supervision that had done so much for the islands, and to put their finances on a stable basis. Before General Wood accepted the appointment of Governor General he made a tour of the Philippines with Cameron Forbes to study conditions, and their report was of such a nature that no hope was held out to the politicians who were demanding independence. Nevertheless, it was decided to send a mission to the United States. In his remarks to Manuel Quezon and his associates President Harding said:

"It is fair to assume that our only difference of opinion relates to the time for independence. You crave it now, and I do not believe that the time has arrived for a final decision. . . . We have a high respect for your majority, but no less obligations to your minority, and we can not be unmindful of that world responsibility wherein your fortunes are involved with ours."

When President Harding's Governor General, an administrator of world-wide reputation, advises against independence at this time, he should not be overruled unless it is shown that the natives have made good use of the large measure of control allowed them under the Jones act. For eight years an opportunity was given them to qualify for independence, but they have fallen short of the example set them by their instructors in government. In education and public works they have fallen back, and their management of public finance has not been distinguished, to put it mildly.

A VICIOUS AMENDMENT.

(Santa Paula Chronicle.)

The proposed Water and Power Act has been characterized as a vicious measure by the great majority of organizations speaking for the engineering and development interests of California. Reading it affirms this judgment, the act being so drafted that its passage would mean government trespassing on the domain of business beyond the limit of American patience.

RUSSIA.

(New York Mail.)

There are three ways of treating Russia. The first is the French way. The second is the British way. And the third is the American way. The manifesto issued by Prime Minister Poincaré shows that the American idea is winning.

France tried to interfere in Russia by force of arms. Behind Kolchak, Wrangel, and other adventurers the hand of France was plainly seen. That was wrong. It was the same mistake that Europe made when she attacked the French revolution.

Britain hopes to trade with Russia. That, again, will prove to be an error of judgment, as even Sweden realizes. Unless Russia accepts the rule of trade, there is no trade to be done. It is like trying to play baseball without bases. The history of trade is strewn with losses incurred by commerce in countries where the rules are treated as scraps of paper.

American policy toward Russia is neither French nor British. It uses neither a futile war nor a futile trade. It aims at neither political power nor personal profit. It is based on the belief that Russia is a sick man. He can not fight. He can not attend to business. But he can be helped. What the United States offers Russia is therefore first aid.

Poincaré's letter accepts at least our diagnosis. Nothing that he says suggests further war in Russia. And despite Lloyd George, neither can Russia expect credits. People will not lend money to a delirious debtor.

Russia has to learn that in sanity alone lies her salvation. If a man will not work, neither shall he eat. You can not have both Bolshevism and bread. You must choose between them.

OLD FAVORITES.

Sympathy.

There should be no despair for you
While nightly stars are burning,
While evening pours its silent dew,
And sunshine gilds the morning.
There should be no despair—though tears
May flow down like a river:
Are not the best beloved of years
Around your heart for ever?

They weep, you weep, it must be so;
Winds sigh as you are sighing,
And winter sheds its grief in snow
Where Autumn's leaves are lying:
Yet, these revive, and from their fate
Your fate can not be parted:
Then, journey on, if not elate,
Still never broken-hearted! —Emily Brontë.

Ode to a Nightingale.

My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains
My sense, as though of hemlock I had drunk,
Or emptied some dull opiate to the drains
One minute past, and Lethe-wards had sunk:
'Tis not through envy of thy happy lot,
But being too happy in thine happiness—
That thou, light-winged Dryad of the trees,
In some melodious plot
Of beechen green, and shadows numberless,
Singest of summer in full-throated ease.

O for a draught of vintage! that hath been Cool'd a long age in the deep-delv'd earth,
Tasting of Flora and the country green,
Dance, and Provençal song, and sunburnt mirth!
O for a beaker full of the warm South,
Full of the true, the blushful hippocrene,
With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,
And purple-stained mouth;
That I might drink, and leave the world unseen,
And with thee fade away into the forest dim:

Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget
What thou among the leaves hast never known,
The weariness, the fever, and the fret
Here, where men sit and hear each other groan;
Where palsies shakes a few, sad, last grey hairs,
Where youth grows pale, and spectre-thin, and dies;
Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
And leaden-eyed despair;
Where Beauty can not keep her lustrous eyes,
Or new Love pine at them beyond tomorrow.

Away! away! for I will fly to thee,
Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,
But on the viewless wings of Poesy,
Though the dull brain perplexes and retards:
Already with thee! tender is the night,
And haply the Queen-Moon is on her throne,
Cluster'd around by all her starry Fays;
But here there is no light,
Save what from heaven is with the breezes blown
Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy ways.

I can not see what flowers are at my feet,
Nor what soft incense hangs upon the boughs,
But, in embalm'd darkness, guess each sweet
Wherewith the seasonable month endows:
The grass, the thicket, and the fruit-tree wild;
White hawthorn, and the pastoral eglantine;
Fast-fading violets cover'd up in leaves;
And mid-May's eldest child,
The coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine,
The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves.

Darling! I listen; and, for many a time
I have been half in love with envious Death,
Call'd him soft names in many a musèd rhyme,
To take into the air my quiet breath:
Now more than ever seems it rich to die,
To cease upon the midnight with no pain,
While thou art pouring forth thy soul abroad
In such an ecstasy!
Still wouldst thou sing, and I have ears in vain—
To thy high requiem become a sod.

Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird!
No hungry generations tread thee down;
The voice I hear this passing night was heard
In ancient days by emperor and clown:
Perhaps the self-same song that found a path
Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
She stood in tears amid the alien corn;
The same that oft-times hath Charm'd magic casements, opening on the foam
Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn.

Forlorn! the very word is like a bell
To toll me back from thee to my sole self!
Adieu! the fancy can not cheat so well
As she is fam'd to do, deceiving elf.
Adieu! adieu! thy plaintive anthem fades
Past the near meadows, over the still stream,
Up the hill-side; and now 'tis buried deep
In the next valley-glades:
Was it a vision, or a waking dream?
Fled is that music:—do I wake or sleep?

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Washington, D. C., boasts a nine-year-old musical prodigy in Katherine R. Gochner, who recently played "Il Trovatore" for a gathering of the League of American Pen Women.

J. D. Beresford, the well-known English novelist, has become a serious investigator of psychic phenomena. He has made some notable contributions to the popular literature of the subject.

Mlle. Marthe Regnier is regarded by critics as the most promising young actress in France. Though she is acknowledged the stage queen of Paris, Miss Regnier's prestige is due to genius rather than marked beauty.

The Hon. Adolfo de la Huerta, Mexican minister of finance, is in New York conferring with a committee of American and European bankers on problems connected with Mexico's foreign debts and the interests of foreigners in railroad and oil properties. The negotiation was recently reported to be proceeding hopefully.

William S. Fielding, Canadian minister of finance, is probably the most experienced tariff and taxation authority in North America. He took part in negotiating the reciprocity agreement of 1911, which failed of ratification, and he continues to favor reciprocity with the United States. Mr. Fielding is a veteran journalist of Halifax who has been in public life for forty years.

Mr. Porter J. McCumber, who has just been defeated in the Republican primaries in North Dakota, would have completed twenty-four years of continuous service in the United States Senate if he had been reelected. The death of Mr. Penrose made him chairman of the Finance Committee, which is in charge of the pending bonus bill as well as of the tariff bill. Ex-Governor Lynn J. Frazier is the successful Republican nominee from North Dakota.

Mrs. Charlotte Cameron of Edinburgh is the most traveled woman of today, according to the Royal Geographical Society. She has just returned from a protracted sojourn in the South Sea Islands. In 1910 Mrs. Cameron covered 10,000 miles in South Africa. Later she continued her exploration of the dark continent, completely circumnavigating it and penetrating portions thitherto unknown even to explorers and scientists. During the war, when most of the world was closed to travel, Mrs. Cameron spent much time in Alaska. During the past three years she has been in South America, Australia, and the South Seas.

Lord Fermoy, who was Edmund Maurice Burke-Roche of New York, and who will be remembered as the elder of twin brothers, sons of Mrs. Burke-Roche of New York, has at last accepted his duties as a British peer, but not entirely. He has declined to sit in the House of Lords and by virtue of his Irish title may relinquish the honor to sit in the Commons. The former Mr. Burke-Roche is trying for the seat for the Horncastle division, known throughout the United Kingdom as the centre of the sporting world. Lord Fermoy served under Pershing during the late war and won many military honors. He succeeded to the title in 1920, but did not immediately accept it.

William Franklyn Paris, architectural decorator, art connoisseur, lecturer and writer, has been elected to membership in the Société des Gens de Lettres of Paris. The only Americans upon whom this honor has previously been conferred are William Dean Howells, Edith Wharton, Henry Van Dyke, Owen Wister and James M. Beck. Mr. Paris was born in New York City about fifty years ago. Among many honors conferred on him during his career was President McKinley's appointment of him as United States commissioner of decorative art at the Paris Exposition in 1900. His decorations may be seen at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, New York, at Princeton and Yale universities, and in many other public and private buildings throughout the East. In 1917 he was presented with a gold medal on behalf of the artists and sculptors of France. Mr. Paris served in both the Spanish-American and the late European war. He is the author of "Decorative Elements in Architecture."

Miss Lorena Trickey, twenty-year-old Oregonian ranch owner, is the champion all-around woman rider of the world. She has held the title for three years, but every year it is vigorously disputed by a dozen or so young women wherever rodeos are held throughout the West. So far, however, no woman has been able to equal Miss Trickey in the number of stunts that she can do on horseback. Her last trophy was awarded her a year ago in Cheyenne, where she competed against riders of both sexes. Before leaving New York, where she has just collected the diamond-studded gold and silver plaque that proclaims her title, Miss Trickey applied for a jockey's license from the Jockey Club, without which a rider of racehorses is confined to "outlaw" tracks. She has even competed against the cavalymen from Fort D. A. Russell in Wyoming in the Roman races, in which the rider stands with feet planted on the backs of two half-tamed horses. She was the only woman to attempt this race at Cheyenne, where she won the event. Miss Trickey is very slight and small of stature. She weighs about ninety-eight pounds and her slim brown arms are covered with scars.

A MIRROR OF THE CONFERENCE.

Mark Sullivan Gives Us an Eye-Witness Account of the Great Episode at Washington.

If you wish some vivid pictures and revealing analyses of the Washington Conference you can hardly get any that will be more vivid and revealing than those contained in "The Great Adventure at Washington," by Mark Sullivan, Washington correspondent and political editor of note. Sullivan has the gift of a priori inference, and he has a remarkable power of getting scenes before his readers' eyes accompanied by clear expositions of the significance of what he makes them see. His judgment and political insight are worth much, especially when applied to so fateful a development as the Conference for the Limitation of Armaments; and his explanations are of a sort, not merely to throw light on what really happened, but on the reasons why, and on the probability of similar happenings if the same elements shall be involved at some future time.

This is current history, written while it was hot, from notes made on the scene. But it is much more—it comes as close as anything human can to reproducing the actual scenes and settings, the characters and their movements, the cues and responses, as though the whole grand and in some respects tragic drama of humanity trying to save itself from itself were being again enacted for our benefit on a stage whose curtain rises for us whenever we choose to open the covers of the book. The dispatches at the time could not have been expected to give us much more than speeches, transactions, and results. That Conference was a hard thing to report, and the reporters did well with it, even to Mr. Wells, who has had little real reportorial training. Necessarily we have had to wait for a book to give us any deliberate and studied account, accompanied by such particular human views as this:

I know that all the official documents in the world can't convey as much essential fact to the distant and future reader as did the look on Lord Beatty's face to the historian who had the advantage of being in the room when Mr. Hughes, in that sensational opening speech of his, said that he would expect the British to scrap their four great Hoods, and made equally irreverent mention of the King George the Fifth. That was truly history in the making, and Beatty's look was the stuff of which real history is made—when the historians can get it, which they usually can't. The future historian may or may not identify that particular moment as the exact point where two great nations changed their relation to each other and the relation of each to the rest of the world; at the exact moment when Great Britain ceased—and knew she ceased—to have the exclusive franchise for laying down the law about navies and sea-power and control of the sea altogether. Also I may or may not be right in saying that this particular moment had this particular significance. All this, and the whole body of the broad effects of Hughes' speech on the history of the world, is discussed in Chapter XI. The point I am making now is that no future historian, who must depend upon digging into the official documents and examining the coded cables that raced across the Atlantic, will ever find anything as vivid as that look on Lord Beatty's face. Lord Beatty is the head of the British navy—and the British navy was being treated impudently. Lord Beatty is the custodian in his generation of a tradition that has lasted for over a hundred years, and that tradition was being menaced.

However, the more complete picture of all this is in Chapter I, which pictures that dramatic opening session in full. The point I am making now is merely that the vividness of scenes like this is the advantage that the contemporary historian—even though a hurried journalist, with no pretense to exhaustiveness or authoritativeness, or even to absolute accuracy—has over the formal historian who must depend on documents.

It was, in fact, without any exaggeration, a historic moment. What it was could not be more compactly expressed than in the words (the, let us say, extreme modernness of them need make them no less useful for the vivid recording of history)—the words of the American reporter who took one startled glance at Hughes and then exclaimed in a piercing whisper to his neighbor, "Great balls of fire, the man's telling the British navy where it gets off!"

Just how much Hughes' words, and the results of the Conference altogether, may mean in the history of sea-power is matter for more careful statement elsewhere.

The delegates, overwhelmed by the startling demands—call them suggestions if you will, they amounted to demands in the light of the world's necessities—of Secretary Hughes, handed this diplomatic porcupine around the table pretty gingerly, and in the course of his account of that strange and strained scene Sullivan gives us this intimate portrait of the man one would think hardest to portray of all those that were there:

Tokugawa is a prince, and the eighteenth descendant in the line of the Shoguns; but he is also a most smiling, open-faced person whose beaming, humorous good-nature gives denial to the assumption that all Japanese are inscrutable. Tokugawa looks and acts like a friendly, neighborly grocer in a smallish American town, a grocer who would find quite as much satisfaction in gossiping with his customers as in selling them sugar or collecting bills from them. He spoke a few gracious words which, together with his manner, gave him a place in the kindly regard of the Conference that grew steadily till the day he left for Japan. The next cries were "Italy, Italy." Signor Schanzer spoke more seriously than the others had. Then Belgium spoke briefly, and finally China, Holland, and Portugal; and then the session ended with a formal motion to meet again three days later.

It was in the course of these astonishing transactions that the man we now, for his exertions, know as the Earl of Balfour changed from a sort of mathematical icicle, detached and impersonal and merely calculating, without apparent interest or real motive, into a warm-blooded creature filled with fervor for the welfare of the world—perhaps because this was the first time he had ever seen any real prospect of advancing its welfare. The change is noted by our author, and it is one of the stimulating passages of his work:

But the point I wish to make is that never again can it be said that Balfour is a man who has never had any warm passion for the betterment of things in this world. To Balfour, the Hughes plan was a thing of inspiration, and he reacted to it with inspiration of his own. He looked upon the need of success for this plan, and worked to bring it to success, with a spirit that was not less than passionate. In any future estimates of Mr. Balfour that aim to be complete, it must be recorded that at the Washington Conference he had an experience of exalted feeling which was unlike anything in his previous career, assuming the contemporary English writers are to be taken as understanding fully the Balfour of the past.

And yet, in so far as these hurried notes of my own, from which I have quoted and from which I shall quote again in a moment—in so far as they show an unsympathetic coldness, there was some justification in the Balfour of the moment. For reasons inherent to the occasion, he was laboring under restraints which came from outside himself and for which he had little liking.

What little things may change the current of history can only be learned from inside history itself, for they are often unbelievable. But here is a case in point, from the disagreeable quarrel between the French and the Italians which caused riots and cost several lives in Italy:

There is another explanation of the episode, which may or may not be as authoritative as the one first published, but which at least has interest and verisimilitude, and may be published here, it is hoped, without causing sudden or unnecessary violence to anybody in Europe. The explanation is to the effect that M. Briand, in entire innocence and speaking in French, conceded that the Italian army was in process of being reduced, and in doing so used a French phrase of which the English equivalent is "a state of decomposition." What he meant, of course, was "demobilization." But the other word was the one that got into circulation; and somewhere in its passage through the French reporter's mind, or in the process of translation from French to English and thence to Italian, it was made to seem that Briand had said what an American would mean by saying in a slang way that something is "putrid."

This explanation is offered for the French demand to be considered entitled to a greater naval strength than the Conference seemed disposed to accord her, although the measure of her demands was one she could not have approximated without crippling herself seriously:

France was holding out for a sentimental prestige, an empty tradition which she had not the resources to live up to in fact. French writers often claim for their people, as a quality in which they are superior to Anglo-Saxons, the capacity and habit of reality, of looking facts in the face. But the truth is, in the Washington Conference, it was the British who showed the capacity to see facts clearly and accept them calmly. In the Washington Conference, Great Britain yielded, without protest or argument, a tradition infinitely more proud than France's. Great Britain had been mistress of the sea, "unchecked by foe, unshared by friend," for practically two hundred years. But she faced the fact that if there should be competition in building—if competition were not stopped by the Washington Conference, and if America should go ahead and build to the extent of her resources—then America must supplant her. Great Britain looked that situation in the face, and made the greatest gesture of voluntary renunciation ever made in history.

The row over the submarine disturbed the world, and seemed to threaten the peace of the Allies themselves. At one time it looked as though it would jeopardize the whole work of the Conference. It cost France much in sympathy, at least for the time, although her position is better understood now that the excitement has subsided, and unprejudiced observers have had time to take account of her peculiar position. It was Root who succeeded in extracting a solution from what looked for a time like an impossible situation. It is pleasant to feel that his genius for the larger accommodations of history could come to the rescue in so signal a manner as this:

At this point Mr. Root entered the situation. On several critical occasions in the Conference, Mr. Root seemed to have the rôle he now adopted. After everybody had got into a snarl, after there had been a head-on collision between antagonistic propositions, Mr. Root came in, so to speak, from the side, at right angles to the collision, with a proposal designed to achieve much the same ends, but so different in detail from the question at issue that it was free from the bitterness of feeling with which the question, as it originally arose, had become involved. Mr. Root introduced four resolutions which, while they did not affect the quantity of submarines any nation might have, nevertheless surrounded the use of those submarines with such restrictions that their effectiveness would be greatly reduced.

The French response to these resolutions was stated by Admiral de Bon. It was to the effect that since the Root resolutions were of "a very special nature," it therefore seemed to Admiral de Bon "that the most practical solution would be to refer the consideration of the text submitted by Mr. Root to a committee of jurists, which would advise us as to its opinion in regard to the wording to be adopted."

But Mr. Root was not to be satisfied with any such dilatory disposal of his resolutions. No committee of jurists for him. It was on this occasion that Mr. Root made one of the best speeches of the Conference.

Root backed these resolutions with a speech in which he said he was approaching the end of his life and would like to see before he died some results of his plan, intimating that if it ever got into the hands of a committee of jurists there would be small chance of his living long enough to see it emerge. He made a ripping speech, which Sullivan reports, including the statements that he could never divest himself of the feeling that the man who sank the Lusitania was a pirate, and that he wanted such acts in the future recognized and dealt with as piracy. In that way he disarmed the situation of its explosive possibilities. The French got their way, and the British received some measure of protection, provided the spirit of the Root resolutions are adhered to or enforced.

One little thing that peeved the French and might have led to momentous consequences was as purely an accident as many a hostess makes when she seats some guest at the wrong part of the table. It seems strange that such a thing could have any consequences at all, but trifles may take on tremendous importance when the air is charged with lightning. This passage will explain much in diplomacy, past and present:

But it so happened that the tables were arranged in the form of a rectangle, and that the number of seats at the top end of the rectangle was just seven. This being the case, it resulted that all the seats at the top table were taken up by the delegates of America and Great Britain, and that the seats of the French delegates were just around the corner from the top table. It was this that caused the lack of gratification of the French. At all the subsequent plenary sessions following the first, in order to give the French one place at the top table, all of the seven seats were moved one seat to the left. The result was that Ambassador Geddes, the third of the British delegates, was moved around the corner of the table to the left. There was nothing extraordinary about this; but another result of the shifting of seats illustrated in a striking way the wish of the Conference to accommodate itself to the sensitiveness of the French delegates. At all of the subsequent plenary sessions, the presiding officer, Mr. Hughes, sat, not at the middle of the top table, which was the natural place for the presiding officer, but one seat to the left of the middle.

How essentially immaterial all this was can be illustrated by the fact that if the Conference table had been in the shape of a letter "U," had been rounded at the corners, the French would have had no occasion to make objection. The mere fact that a triangular corner of pine board, not more than a few inches in dimensions, projected between the French delegation and the American delegation, made all the trouble.

Yet the case for France could hardly be more sympathetically put than in the following:

But the best place to find at least one root of what happened between France and America at the recent Conference is at the Paris Peace Conference.

At that Conference, France wanted certain definite, concrete things, in the way of boundaries and the like, which would make her—or which she thought would make her—secure against Germany in the future. Mr. Wilson persuaded France to give up these things. Mr. Wilson was eager to initiate the League of Nations, and he tried to persuade France to trust her future to that institution. France was unwilling; and then Wilson promised her a military guarantee through a treaty to be signed by America and Britain. Thereafter, America did not go on with the assurances that President Wilson held out to the French. Whether Wilson went too far in his promises, or whether the American Senate was justified in refusing to ratify those promises—all that has been the subject of some millions of words of debate. So far as France is concerned, it does not matter which is the answer. Either is the same to France. France did not know, or certainly did not take account of, the fact that an American President's undertaking in a matter of foreign relations is not valid until the American Senate has ratified it. She has learned it by now; but in the meantime she has been shocked and embarrassed by our refusal to give either of the things that Wilson led her to rely on. We refused to enter the League of Nations, and we refused to ratify the treaty of guarantee. For that action on the part of the United States, France has a title to almost any degree of resentment she may care to feel or express, has a right to generous tolerance from us from almost anything she may do of the sort we describe as "acting ugly."

Whoever wrote "The Mirrors of Washington" might have been proud of this little thumbnail sketch:

There is something about the configuration of Senator Lodge's whiskers, coupled with a somnolently and contentedly blinking quality his eyes frequently have when he is in repose, that makes you think of a venerable cat of the male sex who not only has just eaten a plump canary and is, for the moment, engaged in the delectable digestion thereof; but also has the additional satisfaction of mind, the anticipatory pleasure of seeing ahead of him a long line of more canaries especially provided for his comfort and delight. In short, there are occasions when Senator Lodge gives you the impression of having weighed the world and himself, and the relation of the two to each other, and found the whole quite edifying.

There is a masterful handling of the major themes, as one might well expect from Mark Sullivan. Here is the explanation of the four-power treaty, and as an explanation it is not likely to be improved upon for some time:

The result was that when Mr. Balfour came to America he undoubtedly came with the intention of utilizing his contact with Mr. Hughes to cooperate in any way that could be found to end the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. It can also be taken for granted that Mr. Hughes held the termination of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance to be one of the most important objectives of American diplomacy. Mr. Hughes, obviously, could not take the initiative, beyond letting Great Britain understand that we regarded the alliance as unfortunate. It was for Great Britain to take the initiative, at least to the extent of showing willingness to terminate the treaty, provided she felt completeness of good-will from America to be worth abrogation of her alliance with Japan. The public evidence indicates that as soon as Great Britain showed willingness to cooperate toward finding a way toward ending the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, it was Mr. Hughes who promptly took the initiative in making a concrete suggestion and drafting the treaty.

The four-power treaty, as I say, was a device for terminating the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, so as to satisfy America without offending Japan. By that service it is to be judged.

And here is the conclusion of the whole momentous matter:

It was this peaceful passing of naval dominance, or, to express it more accurately, this turning over of dominance to, so to speak, a board of trustees, making it no longer a prize of selfishness to be contended for by jealous nations, but rather a cooperative responsibility to be administered jointly, that made the Washington Conference "unique in history."

The panorama, the moving picture, of this great episode, one of the greatest of these stirring times, is not likely to be much better presented by any future historian. The author was present, and he makes his reader feel that he is present. A book can hardly do more.

THE GREAT ADVENTURE AT WASHINGTON. By Mark Sullivan. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co.; $2.50.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending July 1, 1922, were $129,400,000; for corresponding week of last year $121,000,000, an increase of $8,400,000.

Nearly every corporation would rather do its financing by the sale of stock than bonds. Then when a poor year comes it could discontinue dividend payments on the stock and there would be no disastrous results to the company, says John K. Barnes in the Century Magazine. On the other hand, if it had sold dividend on it is limited to a fixed rate as is the interest on bonds.

An example of an industrial company that has a well-balanced financial structure is the United States Steel Corporation. When this corporation was organized in 1901 and took over the Carnegie Steel Company and other companies, Andrew Carnegie was paid in $303,450,000 bonds having a first call on the earnings of the new corporation. There is an issue of $200,000,000 bonds that come after these, and $360,281,100 of preferred stock and $508,302,500 of common is now outstanding. Interest on the bonds has been paid regularly and large amounts of both issues have been retired by the corporation through sinking funds. The 7 per cent. cumulative dividend has also been paid on the preferred stock from the start and this stock has sold from as low as $50 a share in the early days to well above $100 a share in every year since 1904. The common stock, which sold below 10 in 1904 and above 136 in 1917, has received annual dividends ranging from nothing up to 16 per cent. during the war.

In the railroad field the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe presents one of the best financial structures. This road has $283,716,000 of bonds outstanding, $124,173,700 of 5 per cent. non-cumulative preferred stock and $224,715,500 common. When this road was reorganized in 1895, following the receivership incident to the 1893 panic (which sent many roads into receivers' hands), the reorganization was based on a large issue of general mortgage bonds, a smaller issue of adjustment mortgage bonds, and on stock. The interest on these adjustment bonds is not a fixed charge like most bond interest, but is only payable if earned. It has been paid regularly, however, is now "cumulative," and there is such a wide margin of earnings over and above it that one now never thinks of this "adjustment" feature. The way in which the Atchison management built up its large equity in property value back of its bonds is an interesting study in railroad financial management.

Railroads in this country, to keep pace with the growth of the country, have had to expand steadily. This has taken money, which has meant new financing—the sale of securities to the public. Atchison did much of this financing by the sale of bonds that could be converted by the buyers into stock. Bonds could usually be sold at a better price to the road than stock and by the efficient expenditure of the money thus secured the earnings of the roads were made to grow so that dividends could be paid on the stock and the advance in its market price from below $10 a share in the first years following the reorganization to above par in each year from 1906 to 1917 made it profitable for the holders of many of these bonds to convert them into stock. This has placed the road's finances in the well-balanced shape that they are today.

If the Atchison management should now take advantage of the present high earnings of the road and raise the common dividend above the 6 per cent. rate that has been paid for the past twelve years, it could probably do its next financing, if it cared to, by the sale of stock direct. The able management of the American Telephone & Telegraph Company increased the dividend on that company's stock from 8 to 9 per cent. in 1921 when security prices were much lower than they are today for the express purpose of making it possible to continue financing the Bell telephone system's growth by the sale of stock and thus keep the company's finances well balanced. This company has also made frequent use of convertible bonds and the higher dividend rate is helping to bring about the conversion of such bonds still outstanding.

For the investor, the convertible bonds of strong companies, if bought at prices that give good returns as investments, that is, before advances in the stocks have carried the bonds up to a speculative level, offer the possibility of speculative profits along with the investment. The certainty, or uncertainty, of such profits of course depends upon the course of the corresponding stock in the market. Today some people, believing that the stock market will go still higher before the present upward swing is over, are turning their attention to convertible bonds. They realize that the phenomenal advance of from ten to fifteen points in practically all bonds within a comparatively few months can not be expected to recur; the only possibility of it lies in a fortunate choice among convertible issues. The writer has been asked by readers of the Century to name such bonds that possess good investment qualifications yet hold out possibilities for advance in price due to their conversion features. In reply to these inquiries he has been glad to give descriptions of the few convertible bonds of strong companies that are available on an investment basis, but without making any predictions as to their future. It may interest other readers to call attention here to the two most interesting issues in this list.

They are the New York Central convertible debenture 6s due 1935 and the Chesapeake & Ohio convertible 5s due 1946. The New York Central bonds were issued in 1915 in connection with the consolidation of the New York Central system and the adoption of a new financial plan. For years the Central had been financing its requirements by the sale of short-term notes at the expense of frequent commissions to the bankers. Under the new plan worked out in conjunction with J. P. Morgan & Co. it issued some consolidated mortgage bonds, some refunding and improvement mortgage bonds and these convertible debenture bonds. A "debenture" is simply a promise to pay without any mortgaged security back of it. With $100,000,000 of these 6 per cent. bonds outstanding which can be converted any time prior to May 1, 1925, into stock at $105 a share, the present improvement in earnings creates an interesting situation. Earnings are sufficient to make possible the payment of more than the present 5 per cent. dividend on the stock. It would place New York Central's finances in a much better balance to have these bonds exchanged for stock. It now has $736,000,000 of bonds outstanding, including this issue, and only $250,000,000 of stock.

In 1914 the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway faced a crisis in its history. It had followed the plan of financing with notes and it was faced with an early maturity that might spell receivership. Kuhn, Loeb & Co. came to its assistance and with the National City Bank took an issue of $33,000,000 five-year 5 per cent. notes making the railway company agree to spend $17,000,000 from net earnings for capital expenditures during the next five years before it paid any dividends on its stock. In two years the credit of the road had so improved under this plan that the same bankers underwrote an issue of $40,180,000 thirty-year 5 per cent. convertible bonds and the notes were called for retirement at 101. This removed the Chesapeake & Ohio from the precarious position of a note-seller. These convertible bonds are secured by pledge of $45,920,000 of the road's first lien and improvement bonds the last mortgage on the property. They are convertible into common stock at $80 a share to April 1, 1923, at $90 a share from then to April 1, 1926, and at $100 a share for the next ten years. This gives each $1000 bond, at present, a call on twelve and a half shares of stock. Earnings of the Chesapeake & Ohio would also justify an increase in the dividend rate and conversion of the bonds would strengthen its financial structure, which now stands $186,251,000 bonds and $62,795,800 stock.

The stock market during the past two weeks has suffered its first sharp break in nearly ten months, and this has been followed by a so far moderate rally. This reaction was undoubtedly due chiefly to the market's weakened technical position after its prolonged advance, although there has been much talk of various apparently unfavorable news developments, and this has doubtless had its effect.

The present failure of the Conference of International Bankers to arrange terms for a loan to Germany, owing to France's obstinate stand on the treaty of Versailles, is disappointing, but inasmuch as there can hardly be economic recovery in Europe without such a loan, and as France herself would be in the end the chief beneficiary, it is likely that eventually she will listen to reason.

The reports of the 201 Class 1 railroads, as filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, show that in April the net operating income amounted to 3.93 per cent. on the official tentative valuation, which compares with 5.85 per cent. earned in March. This decrease is due to lessened traffic in coal, but the latest figures on car loadings indicate larger freight business in other commodities and therefore better results may be expected for May.

Action is expected by Congress shortly on the tariff and ship subsidy bills, and passage of these measures should exert a favorable effect on many stocks. Reports continue to come of increasing industrial activity throughout the country. Pennsylvania crude oil was marked up 25 cents a barrel and the other grades with it; raw and refined sugar went to the highest prices they have so far reached this year, and the pound sterling touched the highest price in three years.

Conditions in the steel trade continue most encouraging, with operations apparently little hampered by the coal strike. The Republic-Midvale-Inland Steel merger, which will be known as the North American Steel Company, has received the approval of the Lockwood committee, which has been investigating it. This consolidation is one of the cleanest and fairest that has come out of Wall Street in a long time, and it and the Bethlehem-Lackawanna merger, which will also doubtless be approved by the congressional committee, should result in great economies, increased efficiency, and in the long run lower prices on the average to the consumer.—The Trader.

roads. The tentative plan was put forward in order to elicit a full record upon which the plan to be ultimately adopted can rest, and without prejudgment of any matter which may be presented upon that record.

"The Supreme Court's decision divorcing the Central Pacific from the Southern Pacific necessarily will be considered by the commission when evidence is received pertinent to railway properties in Western territory. The joint operation of these two roads has been declared by the court to be in restraint of competition. The commission is obliged to abide by the provision of the law that competition must be preserved, and must recognize this prerequisite to consolidations before recommending or approving any groupings to be announced in its final report.

"Professor Ripley included the Central Pacific in the Union Pacific consolidation, as he evidently entertains the opinion that its proper place with respect to the transportation needs to the territory in question is in that proposed grouping. While the commission is not in any way bound to accept Professor Ripley's plan as other than suggestive, the commission as part of the government, and like any corporation, partnership, or individual, must be governed by an opinion of the Supreme Court. Alternative action, however, only may be determined upon by the commission after all parties who may desire to do so have presented evidence. Shippers will have full opportunity to be heard before this proceeding is closed."

Transportation shares have featured the dealings in the stock market recently under the leadership of New York Central which advanced to a new high figure for this year as railway earnings have continued to increase and the number of idle cars to decrease with every prospect that there will be a further increase in traffic as soon as shippers are able to avail themselves of the lower rates that take effect July 1, and the coal mines resume full operations, says E. F. Hutton & Co. in their monthly review.

Railroad convertible bonds have shown a very much better tone owing to the strength of the shares into which they are convertible and little attention appears to have been paid to the possibility of a strike of railway employees on July 1, as threatened, the prevailing opinion having been that the unions would not venture to take the step as they must realize that a strike at this time of the employees affected by the wage reductions recently ordered will do them very little good.

A complete walkout of these employees which has now been ordered to take effect July 1 will not tie up traffic unless there is a sympathetic strike of the operating forces for which there is no justification and which does not appear likely inasmuch as they are not affected by the wage reduction and in any event it is understood that the Federal Government will stand behind the Labor Board whose decisions are made in accordance with the provisions of the Transportation Act and should therefore be complied with, both by the railroad companies and their employees, in the interest of the public.

Declaration of a semi-annual dividend of 3½% by Great Northern stimulated buying of that issue which resulted in an advance of four points and the persistent accumulation of Pittsburg and West Virginia stock occasioned a rise of several points while the buying of New York Central has continued to be of the best kind as the management reported further progress in its plans for unifying all of the New York Central lines. Seasoned dividend paying railroad stocks have demonstrated their strong technical position by holding firm during the recent sharp reaction and will no doubt become favorites as they are now selling out of line with interest rates in the money market. It is estimated that from January 1 to June 1, this year, 80,000 freight cars were ordered, as compared with 28,358 cars during the entire year 1921, as a result of which there has been a decided improvement in the Railway Car Manufacturing industry which is very encouraging to all concerned as it gives assurance of additional equipment being furnished the railroads with which to handle the increased traffic that will result from lower freight rates and improved business conditions.

An issue of $200,000 first mortgage sinking fund gold bonds of the J. B. Bradford Properties, Inc., is being offered by Hunter, Dulin & Co. The bonds constitute a closed first mortgage on 7056 acres of diversified farm lands in five separate holdings—three in Sacramento County, the fourth is operated in connection with the company's cattle business, and the fifth is in the fruit belt near Auburn, Placer County. The bonds are priced at 101, to yield 6.90 per cent.

Bond & Goodwin & Tucker are participating in a new issue of $5,000,000 Los Angeles Gas and Electric Corporation general and refunding mortgage 5½ per cent. gold bonds, Series "E," non-callable for ten years and due June 1, 1947. Price 96½ and interest. The company agrees to pay interest without deduction for any normal Federal income tax up to 4 per cent. which it may lawfully pay at the source. The issue is secured under the general mortgage by property which, including the additions provided for by this financing, together with the proceeds from the authorized issue of $7,000,000 preferred stock, is conservatively valued at over $45,000,000, or more than 1.96 times the corporation's total funded debt, including this issue.

At the regular meeting of the Board of Trustees of The Equitable Eastern Banking Corporation, held June 29, 1922, a semi-annual dividend of 4% was declared on the capital stock of the company, payable July 5 to stockholders of record, June 30.

Previous dividend payments have been at the semi-annual rate of 3%. The Equitable Eastern Banking Corporation, which is a subsidiary of The Equitable Trust Company of New York was organized on January 1, 1921, with a capitalization of $2,000,000 and surplus of $500,000. The corporation shows a strong position maintained during 1921 and 1922, the first year and a half of its existence.

The Southern Pacific received from the Union Pacific at Ogden 580,000 tons of freight and delivered to the Union Pacific at Ogden 1,332,000 tons of freight in the year 1921, Wm. Sproule, President, Southern Pacific Company, pointed out in a recent statement.

"Contrast this with the Sunset Route about which so much has been said," Mr. Sproule continued. "In 1921 we delivered at El Paso to the Sunset Route 348,000 tons of freight and received from them 412,000 tons of freight, showing how little figure the El Paso route cuts in comparison with the Southern Pacific's great contribution to the Ogden Route."

These figures have a bearing on the threatened disruption of Southern Pacific lines, separation of Central Pacific from Southern Pacific lines having been ordered May 29, 1922, under the Sherman Act of 1890 because of the Southern Pacific's ownership of its Southern Sunset Route. The Central Pacific owns, among other lines, that part of the Southern Pacific System extending from Southern Pacific lines in California to Ogden where connection is made with the Union Pacific. Central Pacific lines have been leased by the Southern Pacific since 1885. The lines of the two companies have been operated under one management since 1870, and have developed as a single unit.

Mr. Sproule, referring to flagrant effort made in an anonymous way to mislead the public into the belief that the "Southern Pacific is attempting to override the decision of the Supreme Court," said: "So to attempt would be a piece of folly. It is needless to say that the orders of the court must be obeyed; that is not debatable.

"When obeyed, the Interstate Commerce Commission then holds jurisdiction under the Transportation Act of 1920, and they are empowered to group the railroads to the extent that it is to the public interest, in the judgment of the Commission.

"The tentative grouping of the Commission already made (subject to hearings hereafter) allows the Central Pacific to remain with the Southern Pacific. This tentative grouping would when confirmed afford remedy for the

You Can Select Safe Bonds Easily—

Safety, it is true, is more important than all other considerations in bond buying. Yet, the selection of safe bonds is a very easy matter.

For example, the bond house of recognized conservatism will lend its name and reputation only to issues of established safety. By selecting bonds only in cooperation with a conservative bond house, you are thus assured safe investments.

Blyth, Witter & Co. is particularly zealous in maintaining conservative standards in all "underwritings" and recommendations. These standards admit of no compromise and permanently protect the funds of our clients. Every bond which appears on our list is a safe investment.

The next time you are in funds for investment, we suggest you send for our list of current offerings. A letter, a phone call or a personal call brings the desired information without obligation.

unfortunate legal situation presented by the Sherman Act standing alone."

Mr. Sproule, in a former statement, pointed out that "the Interstate Commerce Commission has at its command a greater knowledge of the railway traffic of the United States and its competitive and other features than any organization in our nation." He said further: "We recognize that whatever is to the public interest in the light of experience up to the present time is likely to prevail, as affecting the people served by and using this railroad system."

The rise in prices which began a little more than a year ago has brought many prime securities back to what would have been an average yield before the war, if some allowance is made for the altered tax situation, says the National Bank of Commerce in New York in Commerce Monthly. New offerings have been heavy for a long time. The apparent insatiability of the market, based in part on the expectation of advancing prices, caused unduly eager bidding for new issues, and offerings in some instances have been at prices to yield less than the investing public is as yet prepared to accept. The consequence has been narrowing markets, both in New York and London. The bond market is no longer exclusively a sellers' market. It is also a buyers' market, in which bonds can be bought for long-time investment with the expectation neither of large profits from rapid rises nor fear of heavy losses from declines.

Transactions in bonds on the New York Stock Exchange from May 16 to June 15 amounted to $371,000,000 compared with $457,000,000 from April 16 to May 15.

On June 7, the United States Treasury offered an unfixed amount of 4 3/4 per cent. notes, to run three and one-half years, in exchange for 4 3/4 per cent. Victory notes. The rate was lower than generally expected and only about $200,000,000 were tendered up to June 15, the offer to exchange being open to June 22. An issue of $250,000,000 United States certificates of indebtedness dated June 15, 1922, to run one year and bearing 3 3/4 per cent. was heavily oversubscribed.

Foreign offerings continued to be prominent. Among them were a $25,000,000 loan to the United States of Brazil due in 1952 offered to yield 7.30 per cent., a $24,000,000 issue of 8 per cent. bonds of the Republic of Bolivia, offered at 101, and an issue of $7,500,000 of bonds of the City of Greater Prague (Czechoslovakia) to yield 8.17 per cent. There was a simultaneous offering of £1,500,000 in London. On June 15 a $25,000,000 forty-year loan to the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes (Yugoslavia) was offered to yield about 8.40 per cent. A foreign industrial offering of interest was the 30,000,000 guilder issue of Anton Jurgens' United (Margarine) Works 6 per cent. bonds at $905 per 2,500 guilder bond. Part of the same issue, 10,000,000 guilders, was offered in Holland.

The more important domestic issues were $22,500,000 Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company first mortgage 7 per cent. bonds due in 1947 offered to yield 7.12 per cent., and $35,000,000 New England Telephone and Telegraph Company first mortgage 5 per cent. bonds of 1952 offered to yield 5.15 per cent.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

It often happens that about the time the financial writers and the newspapers in general become conscious of a great bull movement in Wall street, that movement has really reached its logical end and stocks are "due for a fall." There are equally hopeful signs, only a few as yet, it is true, but there are some, that the long run of obscenity in fiction is approaching its limit, and that novels are henceforth going to require less chloride of lime on them. If this is true, it will not be from any access of prudery. We are not at present a prudish people. Extraordinary frankness of speech appears to have replaced the decent reticences that once characterized polite conversation. And we have grown yawnfully accustomed to movie villains dragging women into rooms, and don't seem to care what happens to them anyway. If Victorian cleanliness returns, it will be owing to no spasm of reform or particular care about the morals of our young, but to the far more secular and effective fact that the subject of sex and sex irregularities has been worse over-worked than cowboys in the films, and there is nothing further to be said on that subject that is both true and important.

We had it done up in cheap form in the Albert Ross novels of thirty years ago. We also had it about that far back, with some most important and artistic implications, in Hardy's "Tess," and "Hearts Insurgent," or "Jude the Obscure." We had sex in literature until it was done to death and its interest was exhausted. It never was very necessary to the literary artist anyhow, for Stevenson and Mark Twain got along admirably without it; in fact, without any real women, to speak of, in their work. If all the expositions of its innumerable variants had ever improved the relations of men and women and enabled them to live in greater harmony and justice, the sex theme in fiction would have been justified, but we seriously doubt if it ever healed a single heart-ache. On the contrary it has been futile as a regulator of sexual relations, and has probably made things in that field worse instead of better. And now the public appears to be getting tired of it.

The reaction seems to have set in, led in England by Mr. Brimley Johnson, in his "Moral Poison in Modern Fiction," published by Philpot at two shillings sixpence, and cheap at the price if it will help bring relief. At present the buyers of obscenity seem quite active, and the demand appears to be running full; but so do the buyers of stocks and the demand for them appear, just before the inevitable market slump. There is, of course, a good deal of pretentious pother about "writing life," just as there always has been. But there is lots of life to write about after sex has been discarded as a theme. Mr. Wells has been especially bold in his declaration of independence on that subject: declaring that he and his fellow literarians are going to write "subject only to our limitations about the whole of human life—we are going to write about it all." But art is supposed to consist of about ninety per cent selection, so why select something of which the public has had a surfeit? Our own theory is that it is done because it is easy—easier than inventing better plots with motives for the characters less in need of deodorization. Only a race of morons could be continuously pleased by the repetition of one threadbare theme, and certainly sex interest is threadbare. To many persons it is a worse bore than bare legs on the stage.

This is partly the result of the war, which in this instance appears to have hastened a process already setting in. The war released crude passions and in many unschooled souls produced an orgy of primitive desires. Literature responded to the sinister stimulant, and we have had a flood of novels with strumpets for heroines, or heroines that threw aside all salutary restraints in the face of sudden separations and what they interpreted as the call of the nation for more lives. Such themes were not new. We hardly needed more than one "Moll Flanders," or a new version of "Tom Jones." They left little to be said on this anatomical and sociological subject. Yet Mr. Wells presented us, in "Mr. Britling," with a respectable literary man plunged in a stupid and uninteresting intrigue under the strain of war conditions, and Mr. Galsworthy outdid Gouverneur Morris with a scene in which a heroine proceeds in a manner to bring into the world a nameless child merely because the suddenly-elected father is starting with equal suddenness for the front. Such stuff as that is not merely unnecessary—it is stupid. It may have the most refined artistic form, but it is really not much better literature than "Three Weeks," or the essays of little boys chalking naughty words on a fence. Mr. Wells and Mr. Galsworthy are rather finished literary performers, but this is hardly their best sort of performance; and they have had hosts of lesser followers who have fiercely overplayed, and we hope overstayed, the market. Altogether it has created a recent literary atmosphere that smells a good deal like a dirty cellar, where the potatoes sprout long, white, unsunned and unhealthy shoots, and the parsnips just give it up and rot. It was enough to make any healthy public long for clean, dry air.

The theme of love in human life grows tiresome—not love in reality, but love as a sort of stage prop of literature. We have had far more than enough of it; and there are so many other absorbing motives. There is the mystery story, the adventure story, the picaresque plot, and a whole range of character development through vicissitudes of fate and fortune unconnected with man's interest in woman. A good plot turned up in this city within the week—the news story of a man that was shot burglarizing a house which he or some one else had been making persistent efforts to enter illegally for six months, although it was a house where no one could expect to find either money or bootleg whiskey. More healthful diversion could be supplied through the unraveling of such a mystery than through forty chapters dealing with so-called "life," consisting of the amative approaches of a male toward a female of this particular species. For life is not confined to the amatory pursuit nor the hymeneal condition, and it has a score of interest compared to which the sex interest is nothing but a nuisance.

"A plain story simply told."

Say what we like about the anarchy in the South, there is no town there which can show such a record as that which is put into simple arithmetic in Belfast's weekly casualty list, says the Manchester Guardian. The kind of violence of which we read almost every morning recalls the ferocity of Balkan politics. And all the while there is a steady stream of refugees who have lost home, occupation, belongings, stripped of everything, like the Catholic householders in that wild pandemonium of which Dickens gives us so vivid a picture in "Barnaby Rudge." In three days of last week, our correspondent declares, some 1500 Catholics, men, women, and children, had the roofs pulled or burnt over their heads.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Peter

In our opinion E. F. Benson has shot his bolt. Obviously "Peter" is pot-boiling, as was "Lovers and Friends." The point is, does indefinite pot-boiling at the rate of two a year utterly ruin a man or is it only a temporary aberration? Will Mr. Benson ever give us anything so good as the "Dodo" books again?

It is hard to realize that "Peter" is by Mr. Benson. True, there is the same effervescent chatter, and also, alas, the same lack of substance that is the distinguishing character of all the Benson books, but there the resemblance ceases. "Peter" is sentimental, twaddlingly sentimental, and at that one can swallow everything but the last chapter. The last chapter—we hate to say it of any one who has furnished us so much sheer fun as the author of the "Dodo" books—the last chapter is impossible. So long as Mr. Benson remains in the realm of pure nonsense one does not dispute his facts. Anything goes over in the Alice-in-Wonderland style, but when he descends from the ethereal heights to plain realism, it is not amiss to make him toe the line of probability. Anyone who has experienced an accident like the fire in the final chapter of "Peter" is immediately struck by the improbability of Peter's and everyone else's conduct. If it weren't for the fact that Sylvia, too, was in danger the reader would heartily wish that Peter would be trapped in the cul de sac of his own making. It would serve him good and right.

No, Mr. Benson, we do not think that you should attempt the serious vein, neither the serious nor the sentimental. Hard, bright, sophisticated, and ironic nonsense,—you are master of all these—but they are inappropriate adornments for a sentimental romance whose nature is only adapted to boarding school consumption.

PETER. By E. F. Benson. New York: George H. Doran Company; $1.75.

Men of Affairs.

Detective stories are very popular of late and, as usual, when a thing becomes a fad, satiation soon sets in. A mystery story, therefore, has to be of a very superior order not to pall on one's palate after a steady diet of these things. However, Mr. Knopf seems to get the cream of detective stories. One remembers that he published Mr. Fletcher's fascinating yarns. "Men of Affairs" by Rowland Pertwee is of kindred excellence. One might take exception to the improbable series of events which are the backbone of Mr. Pertwee's story, but that would not be playing the game. A mystery story must have a mystery, and credit must be given Mr. Pertwee for having found a most remarkable theme. Better yet, he lets the reader in on the secret from the beginning.

Writers of detective stories would do well to remember the famous criticism of Sheridan's screen scene in "The School for Scandal" that the dramatic effect lies in the audience's knowledge of who is behind the screen. In addition "Men of Affairs" is well written, well constructed, and Mr. Pertwee's exposition of human nature in peculiar circumstances has the ring of truth.

MEN OF AFFAIRS. By Rowland Pertwee. New York: Alfred A. Knopf; $2.00.

Arabic Thought.

The story of the wanderings of the vital spark of Greek culture through strange lands is told in "Arabic Thought and Its Place in History" by the Rev. De Lacy O'Leary, lecturer in Aramaic and Syriac at Bristol University. The transmission of Greek philosophy and science is traced through the Syrian Church, the Zoroastrians of Persia, and the pagans of Harra to the Islamic community. Here, in spite of some modification, this culture left an enduring impression on Moslem philosophy and on popular beliefs. After a chequered career in the East it passed over to the Western Moslem community in Spain, where it had a very specialized development, and attained its final evolution in North-East Italy, where, as an anti-ecclesiastical influence, it prepared the way for the Renaissance. "But this main line of development is not really the most important," the author says. "All along that line it was branching off on one side or another, and its richest fruits must be sought in these side issues, in the scholasticism which, in Islam, in Judaism, and in Christianity, was a reaction from its teachings, and in the medical, chemical, and other scientific studies of the Middle Ages, which largely owed their inspiration to its influence." It is an imagination-provoking tale.

The Rustle of Silk.

Cosmo Hamilton has employed the rather novel idea of an eighteenth century story transplanted to a modern setting. The result is different, anyway. That is about as much as one can say for it. As any student of history knows, every age has its characteristics. An affair which would have smacked of simplicity itself in eighteenth century France, is in so violent a contrast to present day England as to suggest anachronism rather than originality. Lola Breezy's famous ancestress probably behaved in perfect keeping with her environment. One's imagination has to canter rather briskly, has to jump innumerable improbable gaps in reality, to keep abreast of Lola in the same situation. If our author had not represented Lola as a "nice" girl, the fact would be easier. As it is one strains to imagine a Lola, well bred, of impeccable morals and manners, even rising to such an occasion at all, let alone inventing it. We are reminded that Lola was a throwback. Mr. Hamilton is probably acquainted with the idiosyncrasies of throwbacks and we aren't; so perhaps he knows what he is talking about. But we are nevertheless entitled to our opinion that if Lola were one of these rare creatures, she would have made a complete success of it and not tried to combine the qualities of a wholesome modern English girl with the lively independence of a French courtesan of the old régime. That is not our idea of a throwback.

Notes of Books and Authors.

The Shelley Centenary will be celebrated July 7th. In London the event will be marked by a production at the Haymarket Theatre, arranged by several eminent men of letters.

The Page Company announces that Mrs. Larz Anderson's new novel of "high society"—Polly the Pagan—will positively appear this month.

Stewart Edward White's new book "On Tiptoe" will be published this fall by George H. Doran.

The Doran Company want to know why "Nene," the novel of French peasant life by Ernest T. Perochon, which won the government prize for 1921 should sell 900,000 copies in France and only 1936 in this country. This really beautiful novel deserves to be better known here.

The recent address of Sir James M. Barrie on the occasion of his installation as rector of Saint Andrews University, which struck a responsive note throughout all Britain and even appeared in full in the American press, is already in process of publication by Charles Scribner's Sons. It will appear under the title "Courage."

"Indelible," a first novel published by Houghton Mifflin Company, was produced by its author, Elliot Paul, in eighteen days of white hot work. During that time Mr. Elliot slept only between four and seven a. m.

Lord Morley and Mr. John Burns, who resigned from the Asquith cabinet in August, 1914, are both said to have written accounts of the events immediately before the war. Lord Morley's narrative is not likely to appear during his life time.

In "Variation," James Hunaker's new book, he says, "I contend that an admirable novelist was killed in Mr. Shaw when he deserted fiction for the play houses. He won't agree with me but I should willingly part with all his prefaces for another 'Cashel Byron's Profession.'" So say we.

Publishers' reports show that more people are buying bound volumes of poetry than ever before. Houghton Mifflin, for example, are issuing their seventh edition of Drinkwaters' poems and their ninth edition of Arthur Chapman's "Out Where the West Begins."

Among recent important Macmillan issues was the "Selected Poems" of Lawrence Binyon, the English poet and art lover whom Edmund Gosse calls "one of the most exquisitely gifted of living Englishmen." As a boy Binyon wrote verse which was praised by Browning and Matthew Arnold; but he says that his genius developed slowly and he considers his latest work his best.

Stephen French Whitman, author of the colorful novel "Sacrifice" has spent many years in Italy and is now just returned from a winter in Rome. His comment upon Edgar A. Mowrer's book, "Immortal Italy," just published by the Appletons, is interesting. "The most satisfying book on modern Italy that I have read. The chapters on Italian character and D'Annunzio are masterpieces. The whole thing is so brilliantly and handsomely written, with such keen and civilized criticism that I am full of admiration for the man who has 'done it at last!'"

The restored cabin which once sheltered Mark Twain on Jackass Hill at Sonora, California, was presented on June 10th, to Tuolumne county by W. J. Loring, a mining operator, with Governor Stephens making the principal address. At the barbecue which followed, there was provision for two thousand guests.

Only a week or two before the publication of the book devoted to his life and works, the great composer, Camille Saint-Saëns, died. Now comes the news of the regretted death of Mr. Arthur Hervey, the author of the volume. Mr. Hervey was Irish by blood, Parisian by birth and combined the double office of musical composer and musical critic, and added occasional authorship. His was the first book in the English language entirely devoted to Saint-Saëns.

To save a shift on hills

Many an automobile fails to deliver the power and speed of which it is capable, fails in acceleration and on the hills, because of poor lubrication.

The purpose of lubrication is to reduce friction. In this connection it must be remembered that oils have internal or molecular friction. The heavier the oil the more this internal friction, which has to be overcome by and uses up power.

The ideal oil for the automobile is the thinnest oil which will keep the bearing surfaces separated, and at the same time offer in itself the least frictional resistance to the engine power going to the rear or driving wheels.

Such an oil—if it has "oiliness," stability and purity,—will give perfect lubrication, and permit the development of the maximum power, speed and gasoline mileage of the car.

Zerolene meets these conditions perfectly.

Oiliness—Stability—Purity

Zerolene has great "oiliness," which causes it to cling to bearing surfaces while offering in itself a minimum of frictional resistance to the engine power.

It has great stability, which causes it to resist engine heat and to form a minimum of carbon of a soft, flaky nature which goes out with the exhaust.

And it is pure.

If you follow the Zerolene chart of Correct Lubrication, you will develop the maximum power, speed and gasoline mileage of your car.

THE GALSWORTHY PLAYS.

It has seemed, judging from his more recent novels, as if the great literary ability of John Galsworthy had reached its peak, and begun to decline. Neither "Beyond," "The Saint's Progress," "In Chancery," nor "To Let" are of equal merit with even those works of fiction which could not stand on a level with his masterpiece, "The Man of Property."

To be sure, in "In Chancery" and "To Let" Galsworthy took up again the engrossing theme of the Forsytes, and still succeeded in making them most interesting. But it is evident that he has fallen in love with Irene, his most alluring woman creation, for he is no longer able to view her with the detachment of the artist.

Galsworthy's success with his more recent play, "Loyalties," however, was such as to encourage the bringing out in London of a Galsworthy cycle—this being the epoch of economical revivals—and all of the plays produced were very successful, one of them being also a new play called "Windows."

For Galsworthy is essentially a modern, fully abreast with the ideas of his own era, and sometimes a little ahead of them.

Though born in the upper classes, he has always felt a righteous compassion for the down dog in the lower classes, and the social criticism included in his greater novels and plays has caused the more receptive intellects in his own class dimly to comprehend how ignoble is the motive which causes the more fortunate to form a barricaded union of impregnable caste.

Galsworthy's belief that the patrician is one of a trust linked together for material advantages, the less fortunate classes being overtaxed to sustain their pretense of superiority, is advanced by him without bitterness, but with a calm, judicial deliverance of his message that impresses by all absence of the noisy drum-beating of the iconoclast.

Nor does he make the mistake of making his upper-class characters compounded of wickedness, and the lowlier ones all goodness and virtue. On the contrary he has an exquisitely balanced perception of the virtues and vices of both classes, and of the separate claims of both to due consideration. Never is he guilty of setting up a character to serve as a universal target. We do not, for instance, we can not, like Soames, the husband of Irene, in "The Man of Property," but we esteem his sense of family loyalty, his blundering gropings toward giving and winning affection, and deeply we pity a being so deficient in tact, so obsessed by the idea of property, whether in material advantages or human affections, that misfortune has inevitably marked him for its own.

Galsworthy's great service to the drama of his era has been to force a recognition of the rights of the common man to a place of importance in the drama, his place hitherto having been to appear as an automatic funkey, or a figure of fun, or perhaps as the subordinate male relation avenging innocence led astray. Now he was at last to be the protagonist; not the hero, modern drama having banished that figure of romantic unreality.

The play of "Justice"—played here within a year or two by the Maitlanders on the local stage—will serve as an instance of Galsworthy's elevation of the man of the people to the place of central importance in the drama.

Galsworthy has been criticized for being too aloof in his literary attitude toward those whose undeservedly cruel position in the social scheme of things he has shown in clear relief. But he has poured freely of his own pity into the compassionate heart of a dust-colored little London clerk in "Justice," to such effect that we perceive how infinite and sorrowful is the compassion that fills Galsworthy's heart toward all such well-meaning stumblers as Faldor.

The idea of class against class is carried along throughout Galsworthy's more serious plays, larger issues being treated in "The Strike," a remarkably dramatic treatment of an industrial struggle.

His four masterpieces, "Justice," "The Silver Box," "The Strike," and "The Pigeon" all amount to indictments of human society for its injustice to the poor, or the weak, or the unfortunate, to whom it should serve as the enlightened reformer and protector.

In all his plays Galsworthy has shown a mastery of technique and a sense of the dramatic in situation which has made them intensely interesting. And a perception of the soul of the poet-philosopher who longs to harmonize the cruel discordances of existence is grateful to those who wish their drama to reflect life. But neither Galsworthy's plays nor his novels will ever be popular with the unthinking and the light-minded; who are apt to be made uneasy by works which convey a reproach against society as a whole, even if they are among those who are oppressed by the social machinery.

Perhaps the reason of the success of "Loyalties" in London is because its motive is more social than ethical. It is about the fall from grace of a British officer of distinction, who commits a money theft. It is located in an English country house, and the setting and characters supply opportunity for showing the loyalty of members of a caste against a low-bred invader who would assail them. "Loyalties," therefore, would particularly interest well-to-do patrons of the English drama, but the student of social criticism will not find in it anything like so much food for thought as in the four Galsworthy masterpieces.

FREDERICK FOR THE GERMANS.

* When "Passion" and "Deception," the two successful German film-plays, first struck America, movie fans immediately divided into two unequal factions, of which the smaller recorded its firm determination to have nothing to do with German films. It further asserted its unshakable conviction that "Deception" was propaganda against the British, and "Passion" against the French.

The other and larger faction poohpoohed the minority, and, because it didn't propose to let anything get by unseen, went in considerable numbers to see both plays.

It was apparent, however, to the cool-headed observer, that the Teutons had nothing in mind but the capture of American dollars. They paid much less both for players and labor than the American producers, who have only themselves to thank for the foolishly and impractically large salaries they were paying their stars. So the foxy Teutons cinched them nicely with those two plays, greatly to the benefit of the American public, for American producers began looking over the field to see in what way they could better suit their patrons. Nothing much has developed yet, but at least the undulatory and insufficiently clothed vampire has had her day, and there certainly is some cleaning up of plot and situation.

To recur to the German producers in their own country: they have taken a leaf from their American brethren in the craft, and are assiduously engaged in capturing the interest of the general public. And so successful are they that the popularity of the picture play even threatens to rival that of opera, which, in Germany, has always held its own as supremely the favorite attraction of all classes.

Like the Americans, the German producers are building comfortable picture-palaces to attract the public, in which every possible device to make patrons physically at ease is employed.

One German custom, however, that of giving plays in two or more installments, does not appeal to Americans, for the serial picture-play has never been specially popular here. Another custom they have, of being allowed curtain views in person of their favorite film players, certainly would, and, when practiced, does appeal to Americans.

One big historical play was recently brought out in Germany which, doubtless, the American public will never want to see. It is called "Fredericus Rex." It presents a series of pictures of the life of the Prussian despot, and has been received with such favor, even enthusiasm, as to make it quite evident that Germany still has a hankering after militarism and kingly pomp.

Probably the press may not chance to record whether or not the play has lost its popular vogue since the assassination of Dr. Rathenau, but if it hasn't we would be justified in drawing the conclusion that Germany's democracy is rather half-hearted.

It is not probable, whatever its salary and wages condition may be, that any other country will ever out-do the United States in picture-play production; the following prophecy by S. L. Rothafel, an eastern motion-picture magnate, made before the Society of Motion-Picture Engineers in Boston gives some idea of the confidence felt in the ultimate national importance of the industry:

"I prophesy: that in ten years to come the motion picture will bring a new era; that as an artistic production it will parallel grand opera; that the Government, national, state, municipal, will endow motion picture theatres; that the screen will become the greatest force for the recreation and education of both school child and adult; that through it we will become the most cultured nation in the world."

And now, in the light of this prophecy it seems up to men who engineer the spoken drama in this country to keep a stiff upper lip, and not let the greater art be out-shone, out-classed, and utterly lost to the masses.

AMERICAN INNOCENCE.

The Anatol plays, by Schnitzler, which had quite a run in numerous American little theatres, some years ago, were valuable, or should have been, in convincing the public that it is difficult and sometimes impossible for any but the finest and most discerning players of one nationality to interpret the dramatic works of another. Schnitzler wrote his plays for the Viennese public; who received their drama in a spirit of gay cynicism. Love, to the Viennese, has figured—in their drama, at least—as a purely temporary and subrosa affair, unexposed by the annoying restrictions of constancy, while the Anglo-Saxon idea—which has become the American tradition—esteems the idea of a romantic constancy, however little it is practised.

The American players were quite unable to convey the idea of the Anatol comedies with that airy, cynical lightness which was their due. True, Schnitzler occasionally becomes serious, as in "Professor Bernhardt"; and no doubt the mood of such plays is more easily conveyed.

We were wont, in its hey-day, to think "The Easiest Way" quite devilish, but when it was put on in Berlin this last May it was scornfully stigmatized by a leading German critic as "an excellent specimen of that nursery which the Anglo-Saxons call their stage."

Yes, to the Europeans we are an innocent lot and no mistake. Having worried through a novel by the well-known Russian fictionist Artibasheff—I think that's his name—and through another by Poland's most famous novelist, name of Przybyszewski—I know that's his name because I copied each letter with religious care—I am more than ever convinced that we are too innocent to meddle very much with European drama.

Some time ago there was a riot in Vienna against Schnitzler's play "Reigen." It gave us quite a fellow-feeling here in America to learn that the Viennese were capable of a demonstration against the morals—or lack of morals—in a Schnitzler play.

But a scornful sojourner in Vienna wrote a letter to a New York paper to put Americans right. "Reigen"—an old play and apparently rank with sex and illicit love—didn't shock anybody. What shocked them, as the scornful sojourner pointed out, was that anti-Semitic sentiment was antagonized by having to allow a play by a Jew to appear; for, as the scornful sojourner remarks, "as the custom often is with geniuses, Schnitzler is a Jew."

So the play was stopped in Vienna, but put

Calaveras in 1809 and 1922

In 1809 the ownership of Calaveras Valley in the Coast Range hills midway between Niles Canyon and Mount Hamilton, was in lively dispute between the Pueblo of San Jose and the Mission of Santa Clara.

"What was the end of the dispute," says a historian, "we have been unable to discover, but it seems likeliest that La Calaveras belonged rather to the Mission San Jose."

It was a long time after that dispute that Calaveras became a part of the water supply of San Francisco.

The valley, together with tributary watershed area, was acquired by Spring Valley in 1875, and construction of Calaveras Dam was begun in 1913.

It was a wise foresight, not generally appreciated at the time, that prompted Spring Valley to acquire this property.

At present Calaveras has a capacity of 8 billion gallons of water, but the resources of the watershed are many times that amount.

Under an agreement with the City and County of San Francisco, the Railroad Commission requires Spring Valley to enlarge the dam to a height of 175 feet so that it will impound 32 billion gallons of water, thus adding 24 million gallons daily to the water supply of San Francisco.

The design of Calaveras Dam, however, provides for an ultimate height of 210 feet, at which height the reservoir will yield 50 million gallons daily, doubling the present water supply of this city.

The present development undertaken by Spring Valley in consonance with the decision handed down by the Railroad Commission and approved by the Board of Supervisors, will solve the immediate water problem of San Francisco by increasing Spring Valley's daily yield from 42 to 66 million gallons.

So now we may comfortably return to our American-made convention that nothing shocks the Europeans, and that we, in America, can be as pachydermatous as we please concerning what is risqué in farce and musical comedy, but, if a dramatist in a spirit of social criticism dares to become serious about anything concerning sex we will call in the police.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Civilization has always been deeply influenced by inventions, said President Lowell of Harvard in his recent baccalaureate sermon. No one can doubt that a change was wrought in the ancient world by the use of metals. The improvement of transportation by land and water enlarged trade, and trade brought intercourse, with its new relations, its enlarged horizon, and its temptation to a foreign conquest, until the sailing ship and the mariner's compass opened the whole world to the people of Europe. It has been pointed out that the invention of firearms, and especially of cannon, destroyed the feudal organization of society, because the baron's castle was no longer a refuge difficult to capture.

There are 1348 American students at various French universities.

The Columbia Theatre.

Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln," which begins at the Columbia Theatre Monday night, July 10, has been one of the great plays of the present generation. It has an appeal as drama in itself, for the story of the Great Emancipator is tremendously dramatic. The author has told the story beginning when Lincoln was about to be nominated for the first time and carrying it through by graphic and telling incident, until the climax is reached at Ford's Theatre on that fateful April day when the nation lost its greatest man.

Frank McGlynn plays Lincoln to the life. It is not alone that he looks like Lincoln, but that he has been able to project across the footlights the power, the strength, and the spiritual force of this man who has in so short a time become an ideal for all the world. Mr. McGlynn's success has been very gratifying to a host of friends who knew him as man and boy and who now see the fruition of his long and studious work.

There are six scenes in "Abraham Lincoln." The first is in Springfield, Ill., the second, third, and fourth are in Washington during the civil war, the fifth is at Grant's headquarters just before the surrender of General Lee, and the last is, of course, at Ford's Theatre. In the settings it has been possible to maintain at all times the illusion of time and place.

Some thirty-five speaking parts are involved, and Mr. Harris has in this the largest dramatic organization on tour. But the performances which will be seen at the Columbia will be in every detail the same as those at the Cort Theatre, New York, during the year's engagement in that city. There will be no Sunday performances. The matinees are on Wednesday and Saturday.

The Orpheum Next Week.

John Steel is an American tenor making his first Orpheum tour. He has just come from a sensational success in the Ziegfeld Follies.

Theodore Bekefi and his company are Russian dancers and have created a furore of approval of their work wherever they have played.

Kane and Herman are "Two Midnight Sons," who can sing and, it is claimed, make you laugh until your sides ache.

Mildred Harris has proved herself a success as a legitimate star as well as on the picture screen. Her present skit, "Movie Mad," is one of the best vaudeville playlets seen in the West for many a moon.

Flo Lewis has a charming personality, and can deliver songs and comedy as can few other women singers on the stage.

Bill Robinson, "The Dark Cloud of Joy," is a whirlwind of merriment and a perennial "show stopper."

Snell and Vernon with their artistic diversion show a consummate artistry which is highly enjoyable.

Butler and Parker call their act "Don't Make Me Laugh," but the title is an anti-theater to their work, because they do make you laugh.

The First Fifty Years.

Drama lovers who enjoy mature entertainment of a high order will be interested in the announcement that Messrs. Reginald Travers and William S. Rainey have secured the coast rights to "The First Fifty Years," the amusing and absorbing comedy of married life now playing in New York. They plan to produce the play in San Francisco early in the fall and later tour the coast cities. The author, Henry Myers, a graduate of Columbia University, has turned an observing searchlight upon certain phases of married life, and exhibits a rare technique in this his first play, which has been acclaimed by New York critics as the finest theatrical achievement of many seasons.

Sprinkled with Titles.

It looks as if the king's advisers would do well to make an end of the bestowing of titles on Dominion citizens, says the Manchester Guardian. The hint was plainly enough given a few years ago by the Canadian Parliament's polite request that, so far as Canada is concerned, the practice should be ended, and it may be noted that in the last birthday honors the Canadian premier took a privy councillorship, which, of course, carries no title with it. But the trouble has now spread in virulent form to South Africa and Australia. We have General Smuts getting up to assure the Union House of Assembly that he had nothing to do with suggesting that a South African banking magnate who has just been made a lord should have any distinction given to him, and we have the Cape Times, a level-headed organ of the British commonwealth, declaring that this particular operation of the fount of honor is likely to have "a most regrettable reaction on the loyal affection for the royal house of both white races in South Africa." Strong language this. But nothing to that of the New South Wales Labor Conference about the Australian knight whom the honors list has created. His title, they say, is "an insult to white Australia"—a phrase which refers to the fact that he happens to believe that Australia's tropical north can not be colonized successfully without introducing colored labor. There is no deadly sin in being a banking magnate, nor in having views on the development of one's country which do not accord with those of some local party. But it seems unfortunate that, despite the known reluctance of the Dominions to be enriched with titled citizens, the home government still persists in making the fountain of honor play on them, and play, moreover, like an ill-directed hosepipe, on individuals whom their fellows consider quite unsuitable for such conspicuous treatment. Those who might conceivably be thought suitable are apparently dodging the jet. Would it not be well to give the stop-cock for Dominion titles a full turn and cut off the flow entirely?

Real Estate and Gasoline.

Here is a thought for taxation experts who insist upon regarding the automobile as a luxury. It comes from Samuel Hopkins Adams: "The value of land is inverse ratio to the amount of gasoline required to reach it." A truth so true that no amount of argument can explode it. Preceding the economic fact just stated, Mr. Adams said:

"Should gasoline, by some miracle, abruptly lose its explosiveness, what values would be most radically affected? Manufacturing, at first thought, would seem to be the worst sufferer, and next to that finance, which backs the motor industry, yet the combined injury to the two would be insignificant compared to the cataclysmic disaster to real estate values. Except in the great centres these are now actually predicated upon the motor-car. Imagine a small city permanently cut off from motor transportation, how long would be required for it to become a deserted village? Nowhere has there been a more profitable, healthful, and valuable development in American life than the suburb. The automobile is the main agency of this growth. It would be difficult to overestimate the influence of the cheap and effective car upon the business efficiency and individual happiness in the agricultural districts. Drain the world of gasoline and there would be a crash in real estate values besides which the worst financial panic would be unimportant."

Never has the relationship between wheels and the land been more forcefully presented.

Canadian Trade and Our Tariff.

The exports of Canada to the United States in Fordney bill commodities in the four months of 1921, as compared with the four months in 1920, fell from thirty-three and a half million dollars to ten million dollars, says Sir George E. Foster in the North American Review. As goods purchased have to be paid for and the purchaser must sell his own products before he can venture to purchase, the result was sure and unavoidable. Canada bought by so much less in the United States and the United States producers lost so much trade. Is it certain that the class supposed to profit by the emergency tariff gained equally or at all by increased prices on their products?

Now we do not quarrel with the policy or its application in this particular instance. We have no right to do that nor any wish. I am only pointing out an unavoidable result. Canada, denied entrance into the United States, must seek other outlets. If old water courses are obstructed by dams preventing flow in one direction, the result is to hollow out channels in other directions to relieve the pressure. And that other direction for Canada must be largely to the British market. Years ago, because of alleged menace of disease in Canadian cattle, Great Britain placed an embargo on their import for breeding purposes and since then Canadian cattle entering British ports have to be immediately slaughtered. Though the menace was proved groundless the fiction has been kept up through the opposition of British cattle raisers. Now there is a decided set towards removing the embargo, and if this is done Canada's surplus live stock will be absorbed in Great Britain, and in addition a valuable increase will be made to our shipping cargo eastward. If the embargo is retained, then Canada must turn its attention to the preparation of refrigerated meats and build up a trade in them with Great Britain. In either case the course of a great product will be diverted from the United States, and once diverted will scarcely again return. And with that diversion goes the equivalent imports by Canada which will be transferred from the United States to Great Britain or elsewhere.

In the field of international relations, curiously enough, we find that the doctor, the lawyer, the milliner, the college president, and the "man in the street" all reveal an equal competence, says Philip Marshall Brown in the North American Review. All are ready with a definite explanation of the ills of international society, and all are prepared to suggest how this universe should be run. In very few cases may it be said that these competent authorities have an accurate, scientifically trained knowledge of the exact nature of international society, and of the laws governing the functions and the relations of nations. The preacher approaches the problem from the general principle of the brotherhood of man; the lawyer from the argument of analogy to ordinary political institutions, and the rest from various points of view, mostly of a sentimental or emotional character. Few of them, if called upon to administer the affairs of a municipality, would have the courage even to express an opinion, but most of them, in their vast ignorance of the nature and functions of international society, have slight hesitancy to enunciate their views. They are perfectly safe because they are in no danger of being called upon actually to run the universe.

VANITY FAIR.

She was a tall, darkling brunette, who would soon be middle-aged: not young, not too old, but ripe and just right. She was smartly dressed, with a dashing hat and good jet ornaments, and she moved with grace and energy. She had two men in her train, and it is a wonder she did not have a dozen. She beamed and sparkled on them, and scintillated at them, and teased them, and rallied and ridiculed them, and got them altogether worse muddled up and spell-bound than Circe ever could have done. They were far beyond their masculine depth and they knew it—knew they were hypnotized and helpless and drowning in a woman's charms. They made feeble resistances that were in themselves surrender in disguise, and they knew it and she knew it, and all three knew that all three knew it, and she exercised her whole empire and conversationally snapped the whip with them whenever she wanted to. It was fast becoming a masculine slaughter and a feminine triumph. But the cleverest woman will go too far at times, and she broke the spell at last. She said: "When are we going to have another dance, Mr. Mack?" Mack hesitated and stammered: "I don't know—exactly. I—ah—I hadn't thought much about it, you know." He was dizzy and pie-eyed. But his friend seemed suddenly released, and blurted: "I wouldn't get mad if we never had another." "ME, TOO!" yelled Mack. "That's just the way I feel about it." And the two brutes escorted her off the ferry-boat, masters of their destiny once more. There are a lot of Cousin Egberts in this world, who can be "pushed just so far."

Yet, with all the high fortitude that defied Verdun, and cut its way into Belleau Wood, the dancing masters of the world assembled last month at Paris to discuss and mayhap decide what the world should dance. We have not yet the results of their deliberations, and do not know what they may bring into a waiting world, terpsichoreanly speaking; but without doubt it will be something new, because there would be no money in teaching something old, since almost everybody who cultivates pedal dexterity knows the old and could not be induced to pay anything in order to be taught it again—to say nothing of the pain of acquirement. About once in so often the prancers must be given some new steps in order to keep the craze alive. If it died, misery would come over the world. Youth is certain to dance, more or less, and with the simple-minded steps of the past decade middle-age could take up this serious form of work and imagine itself young again. Even boys at the most impossible age, when they are normally playing hookey and stealing apples, caught the craze, and the writer heard one of about twelve years at a vaudeville show exclaim: "Oh, if I could only dance like that!" Wonderful ambition of modern youth! Of this conference of dancing masters, second only in importance, if second at all, to the Genoa Economic Conference, the Manchester Guardian says:

"Many new measures are tentatively trodden annually in Paris, but few survive to go forth with the imprimatur of the assembly. Often these are graceful and well-contrived affairs, combining a flavor of the past with a dash of the present, that might with advantage be danced by any of us. But, like those of most academies which seek to regulate man's taste in art or pleasure, the mandates of the dancing professors fall usually upon deaf ears. It is no fault of theirs that bunny-hugging and shimmy-shaking have had a vogue now happily over. Not at their doors can be laid the inanity of the fox-trot, the two-step, and the other lazinesses that have overlaid the ballroom in the last decade. In vain, they will tell you, have they invented measures with grace and dignity, only to find them, too often, brushed aside in the onward march of some negroid convention, refined sometimes to a point of interest. But this year they resume their task with courage as unabated as though ragtime had never been heard of. The new dances so far exhibited seem to be mostly set to waltz or schottische time. One, however, of which the account reads enticingly, is described as 'a mixture of pavane and gavotte, but with rather more sprightliness than those old measures have.' We shall not complain of the added sprightliness if the dancing professors succeed this year in popularizing any measure that gives women a chance to look half as graceful, and men half as courtly, as did those that are blended in this suggestion."

Probably the meanest type of highwayman that has thus far appeared on the planet is the high-jacker. He preys on those that can not, because of the nature of their own transactions, defend themselves. The chances he takes are practically none at all. He is safe, they are in danger. They risk their all to bring relief to thirsty humanity and the brutal high-jacker intercepts the relief far more than half-way from its source; in fact he waits until the transportation is almost complete, and then he pounces upon the poor bootlegger and takes it away from him, and sells it to his victim's customers at an advance. Being himself an outlaw, how can the bootlegger look to the law for protection? He can not, and he does not. He may give battle, but the odds are usually against him, and though bullets fly he rarely wins. In his high-powered motor-car filled with refreshments he is stopped or fired upon, and robbed of his hard-won money or his valuable illicit property. It is distressing to think such things can go on in this land of law and order, of peace and security and contented labor, barring a few little incidents like the one in Williamson County, Illinois, the other day. A man may have good credit and a heavy investment in motor-cars and he may be rolling it into York State over the Canadian border, and be on the point of completing his fortune and retiring, when he hears shots and hoarse commands, must seize his gun and do his best, lose his cargo and roll home to his wife with a bullet-hole through his shoulder. He hates even to call a physician, much less a cop or sheriff. And they call this a land of law! The high-jacker has no mercy. He takes it all; won't split with anybody. We call that lawlessness. Such men have no respect for property, either. How do they know whose liquor it is? What do they care? No more than the customers, who are said to be equally fearless in the matter. "Are you my regular bootlegger?" "No. I'm his regular high-jacker." And the customer gets his regular brand. Disgusting! There should be laws against it, or bootlegging will become a lost art. It is even said by some evil-minded persons that there are Volstead enforcement officers that do a little high-jacking occasionally.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Lord Dunsin tells the story of a London club man who was staggering along the streets of Dublin and jolted into a passer-by. A constable stepped up to him and demanded, "Do you know who that was? That was Viscount Massereene and Ferrand." "Gad!" said the Englishman. "Well, they were both drunk!"

Ex-Governor Hooper of Tennessee is said to be in favor of indirect criticism. Speaking the other day of the Transportation Act, he said: "Indirect criticism is more effective. I know a man who pulled up his clerk in the following manner: 'George, if Atkinson calls today, tell him I'm out. And don't be working or he'll know your lying.'"

A very old story of Sheridan's wit has come down through the nineteenth century. Fox and Grenville were walking down Bond Street one day when they met Sheridan. Fox hailed him: "Hey, Sherry, we were just talking about you, wondering whether you are most knave or fool." "Well, do you know," said Sheridan, taking an arm of each, "I'm a little betwixt the two."

Bill Nye was once chatting with Senator Shirley of Maine and remarked that he had been born at Shirley in the senator's state and he supposed the town had been named for one of Shirley's ancestors. "I don't know," mused the senator. "I didn't even know there was a town named Shirley in Maine." "Neither did I," said Nye tactfully, "till I was born there."

Baillie, the great English physician and morbid anatomist, was once being greatly bored by the account of herself given by a lady who apparently had nothing the matter. When she told him she was going to the opera that evening, the great physician lost his temper. And when she asked whether on her return home she might eat oysters, Baillie retorted, "Yes, shells and all!"

The case seemed to be getting nowhere, and the judge at last said: "I discharge this jury, one and all." A mean, cadaverous-looking member of the twelve arose and replied, "Say, judge, you can't discharge me." "Can't discharge you? Why not?" thundered the judge. "Waal," drawled the jurymen, pointing to the counsel for the defense, "I was hired by that fellow over there."

Major George Haven Putnam, the publisher, gives out the following story about the "Mirrors of Washington," which his house publishes. The secret of its authorship is said to be known only to three or four people. Trading on this and for a joke, the chairman of a literary dinner in New York rose and said, "Will the author of 'Mirrors of Washington' kindly stand so that we may honor him?" Twenty men got on their feet.

Elinor Glyn is responsible for spreading the fame of a fourteen-year-old Los Angeles boy whose composition on the "Ages of Man" ran as follows: "There are three ages of man. One, when we are young we think of the sins we would like to commit when we grow up. This is the age of innocence. Two, when we grow up we commit these sins. This is called the prime of life. Three, when we are old we are sorry we committed them. This is our dotage."

Lillian Leitzel, circus première, was giving a particularly dazzling exhibition of her skill. Her acrobatics are of the most violent nature and in her pet stunt, which she was performing, she throws her body back and forth with jerks that look as though she would tear her arms from their sockets. At the end she hung motionless by one arm, facing the glare of the spotlight. A small voice piped anxiously from the audience, "Mamma, I should think she would hurt her eyes!"

An American tourist in Yorkshire was very much interested in the "quaint" dialect of that section of England. He stopped to have a chat with an old Yorkshireman, who was busy cleaning some harness in the stable yard. Just then a butterfly settled on the stable door and the American exclaimed, "Pretty, aint it? Now what do you call them here?" The old man made a deft shot at the butterfly with his cap. "Yon was a flutterbug," he said stolidly, "but us chaps calls them flugs to save a bit of time."

A traveler from Fiji in the old days reports that at times in the past when the game was first introduced there the Fijians used to get waves of cricket madness and in some outlying villages—where it was not so readily quelled by law—a match would be kept up for weeks on end. Incidentally, they wore their pads strapped on their naked, bootless legs with a very ludicrous effect. But evidently the Fijians have no sense of the ludicrous, for our traveler further reports:

"Another distinguishing mark that rather amused me once up-country was when my house-boy, Esau, came in one day with his hair cut away from one side of his head, looking like a somewhat weird 'parting,' for the remainder stood up as usual like a bass broom with bristles five inches long. I asked him what on earth he had been doing, and he replied: 'Sir, I am now a member of the Lomaloma "A" team, and we have agreed to cut our hair like this, as the store can not get eleven sashes all the same color.'"

During the last presidential campaign a Republican stumper was traveling through the Tennessee mountains in a vain endeavor to convert the mountaineers to the Republican party. On one occasion before making an address he turned to a young mountaineer standing near him and asked, "Well, my young fellow, what are you?" "Democrat," tersely replied the mountaineer. "And why are you a Democrat?" persisted the Republican. "Waal, my pap was a Democrat and my grandpap before him, so I'm a Democrat, too." "H'mm," snorted the Republican campaigner, "suppose your pap and your grandpap had been horse-thieves. What would you have been?" "Waal," the mountaineer considered it, but not for long. "In that case, I reckon I'd be a Republican."

Last winter the loss of honey bee colonies in the United States was 9.4 per cent., compared with a loss of 8.5 per cent. the preceding winter. The average for the seven winters from 1913-14 to 1920-21 was 12.4 per cent.

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Great Lover.

I'm sure you've met this lad before;
His work is fast, though rough.
He feels that all is fair in war,—
In love, it's fair enough.
His tale the Vice-Suppressor takes,
And drinks in every word
(A single swallow never makes
A Summer, we have heard).
Our hero lived in ages gone—
The days of bright romance.
We read about his goings-on
And sigh, "So this is France!"
You must concede, the boy was good
Among the local ladies;
But his intentions toward them would
Not pave the streets of Hades.
How sweet to read of days of old
When knights, to say the least, were bold!
—D. P. in Life.

Our Helpful Absence.

Although declination was a foregone conclusion, it was worth while to have the United States invited to participate in the réchauffage of Genoa at The Hague, for the sake of the replies which were given, says Willis Fletcher Johnson in the North American Review. Mr. Hughes in his letter to Mr. Child again disclosed the workings of a mind approximating Huxley's ideal of "a clear, cold logic-engine" in his impregnable and convincing exposition of the reason why it was impossible for Republican America to have fellowship with Soviet Russia; reasons affected neither by the jingling of the hoped-for guinea nor by the glib camouflage of Moscow. Gladstone said that King Bomba had "erected the negation of God into a system of government." With equal truth it may be said that the Bolshevik oligarchs have formed a system of government out of aggressive negation of civilization and of humanity itself. Such a government America can not recognize; with it she can have no dealings. It may be too much to hope that the infatuated despots at Moscow will realize the fact; but surely the civilized powers of Western Europe must now do so. In bringing them to that state of mind the Secretary of State has performed for them a service of the highest order; from which France seems inclined to profit by aligning herself with America. As for the suggestion which some have made, that America might well go to The Hague because the conference there is to be purely economic, and not political as was that of Genoa, it is quite empty and futile. It was announced in advance that the Genoa Conference was to be exclusively economic, just as positively as the same announcement is now made about its adjourned session at The Hague. If that rule could not be enforced at the one place, there is no assurance that it can be or will be at the other.

The president of Czecho-Slovakia is furnishing the funds for a walking tour of the world by students of Prague University. The itinerary is through Jugo-Slavia and Bulgaria to Constantinople, then to China and Japan, thence to San Francisco and across this country on foot.

For people to live happily together, the real secret is that they shall not live too much together.—English Proverb.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

The engagement of Miss Margaret Crocker Buckbee, daughter of Samuel Griggs Buckbee and the late Mrs. Buckbee, to Mr. John Marion Boyden, was announced at a luncheon given by Miss Buckbee at the Woman's Athletic Club last week. The affair at which the engagement was made known was given in honor of Miss Carol Farr of Detroit. Thirty guests were present. Miss Buckbee made her debut two winters ago at a ball given by her father, Mr. Buckbee and the present Mrs. Buckbee. Mr. Boyden is a graduate of the University of California and the son of Mrs. E. B. Boyden of San Francisco. Those present at the announcement luncheon were Mrs. Francis Langton, Mrs. Paul Fagan, Mrs. Ream Black, Mrs. William Hendrickson, Jr., Mrs. Hubert Haven Anderson, Mrs. Edward Pringle, Miss Edna Taylor, Miss Cecile Brooks, Miss Gladys Quarre, Miss Newell Bull, Miss Elizabeth Moore, Miss Frances Lent, Miss Katherine Bentley, Miss Helen Perkins, Miss Geraldine Grace, Miss Annette Rolph, Miss Helen Brack, Miss Katherine Stoney, Miss Laura Lindsay Miller, Miss Alice Regua, Miss Margaret Lee, Miss Mary Julia Crocker, Miss Marion Crocker, Miss Lillian Hopkins, Miss Julia Van Fleet, and Miss Hélène de Latour.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Cebrian and Lord Cecil Glerawly were the honor guests at a dinner given last week by Mr. and Mrs. Algernon Crofton at the Palace Hotel. Twenty guests were entertained.

Mr. and Mrs. Jerome Politzer, who returned from abroad last week and are staying at the Fairmont Hotel, have had a number of welcoming parties given in their honor since arriving home after an absence of a year. Dr. Harry Tevis gave a luncheon for them at his home in Alma on Wednesday. Miss Louis Bullock gave a tea for Mrs. Politzer Saturday afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. Evan Williams gave a dinner party Saturday night at the Menlo Park Country Club. Friends from Woodside and Menlo were the guests. Dinner was served out-of-doors underneath the oaks.

Colonel Albert E. Truby, U. S. A., and Mrs. Truby gave a reception at their quarters in the Presidio last Saturday. A hundred friends called during the afternoon. Colonel Truby was recently ordered here for duty.

Mr. and Mrs. Douglass Bernitz Crane announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Doris Crane, to Mr. Victor Maxwell at a tea given last Friday at the Fairmont Hotel. Miss Crane is a graduate of Miss Burke's School and attended Stanford University. She recently accompanied her parents on a trip to Europe and the South Sea Islands.

The wedding of Miss Averill Belknap to Lieutenant Andrew Robert Mack, U. S. A., took place June 17 in Newport, R. I. The bride is the daughter of Captain Reginald Bowen Belknap, U. S. N., and Mrs. Belknap. She is a great niece of Mrs. William Asburner of San Francisco. Mrs. Asburner went east for the wedding ceremony which was read at St. John's Church in the presence of several hundred guests. A wedding breakfast was served for the bridal party at "Bel Napoli," the home of the bride's parents.

A Fourth of July dinner dance was given Monday evening at the Marin Country Club. Guests from San Rafael, Ross and San Anselmo were in attendance. Among those who entertained were Mr. and Mrs. Frederick H. Beaver, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. John S. Selfridge and Mr. and Mrs. Philip Foster Brown.

A mixed golf tournament was held Tuesday at the Menlo Club, following which a number of informal dinner parties were given. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Augustus Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Lowery, Mr. and Mrs. Roger D. Lapham, and Mr. and Mrs. Clinton La Montagne.

Mrs. William Hendrickson entertained last week for Miss Elizabeth Schmiedell, whose engagement to Mr. James Moffitt was recently announced. The affair was a luncheon and was given at the home of Mrs. Hendrickson's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Seward B. McNear, in Ross. Among the guests were Mrs. Nicholas Kittle Boyd, Mr. Frederick Hope Beaver, Jr., Mrs. Francis D. Langton, Mrs. Kenneth G. McIntosh, Mrs. Lawrence W. Fox, Jr., Mrs. Horace C. Van Sicken, Mrs. William Kent, Jr., Mrs. Stanley Arnold, Mrs. George Monroe Pinckard, Miss Doris Schmiedell, Miss Patience Winchester, Miss Aileen McIntosh, Miss Florence Martin, Miss Veronica Byrnes, Miss Charlotte Ziel, and Miss Mary Emma Flood.

Mr. and Mrs. George Almer Newhall entertained at a houseparty over the holiday at their home on Lake Tahoe. The guests included Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Murphy, Mr. Richard S. McCreery, Mr. Kenneth Pope, Miss Gertrude Murphy and several school friends of Master George Newhall.

Mr. and Mrs. Timothy Hopkins gave a picnic dinner last Thursday evening at their home in Menlo. ## Saints and Jackdaws.

(An Essay in Eschatology.)

The jackdaws wheel about the towers
Where saints and kings sit, row on row,
And chatter in the ears of queens
Who lived a thousand years ago.

The kings and queens take little heed
Who sit and stare into the West:
Three hundred thousand suns have died
Since they were gathered to their rest.

And still they wait, while underneath
The prebends pace, the canons pass,
The black-gowned students, all agog,
Haste by to service or to class.

On crowned heads and sacred knees
The busy jackdaws fearless build,
And wheel and call, and go and come,
Till every gaping beak is filled.

The clock tolls out, the chimes are rung,
The housewives hurry o'er the green,
The verger with his ebony staff
Sedately walks before the Dean.

Within, the cloistered bodies lie
Of saints and sinners, row by row,
Their bones are dust, their names are lost,
Their dreams are what no man may know.

When will they rise to tell their dreams?
When will the watch at length be done
Of those who then upon the towers
Shall turn and greet the rising sun,

When void will be the carved seats,
And empty graves beneath them lie,
And torn will hang the empty nests
For which the wheeling jackdaws cry?
—Mabel Hart in the London Chapbook.

Cart Tracks.

I have followed cart tracks so much and I know how
They hold the spring's return in their long chan-nels now;

I know, here in town, where the slow sunlight creeps through
The dark and the dust and the sombre work I do,

They shine, for April storms have broken on great hills,
And drenched through pines and bracken-shoots in sun-shot rills,
And flooded green swamp-lands where yellow king-cups grow,

And fallen into quiet where the cart tracks go.
There in shallow water the noonday sunlight dips,
The low wind freshens there his singing southern lips.

And through the hoof-print pools go mirrored days and nights,
With rooks' wings and wrens' wings and sweep of martin flights.

I have followed cart tracks in spring, and I know well
Small song-named flowers, stitchwort and wood sorrel:

And later, in gold days, when June's first sun-wave broke,
I've found mallow there and red leaves of young oak.

—Dorothy Roberts in the Spectator.

In Tenement Street.

Where hides the Spring in Tenement Street:
Spring, with her joy and her exquisite pity?
No green stretches for weary feet,
Or woodland blossoms frail and sweet,
Are ever seen in Tenement Street—
Tenement Street in the heart of the city.

Overhead is a gleam of sky
Between the gray roofs for the eye's beholding;
But over the bustle of passers-by,
And the rattle of carts, and the hawk's cry,
Who learns to listen for earth's soft sigh,
Or the fairy whisper of buds unfolding?

Yet Hope may smile in the grayest gloom,
And miracles be! Lo! here I found it:
Welcome as light in a shadowed room,
Sweet as the shower of its own perfume,
A little lilac tree—in bloom—
Laughed at the dull, dead walls around it.

Here hides the Spring in Tenement Street;
Here is proof of her tender pity!—
Where the lilac scatters her fragrance sweet,
Nodding her delicate plumes to greet Responsive hearts in Tenement Street—
Tenement Street in the heart of the city.
—Edlyn Simms in the Bookman.

A Near View of George Eliot.

The idolatry of certain modern literary gods is no whit more exaggerated than that of sundry giants of the Victorian Age. The Manchester Guardian thus retails a reminiscence of George Eliot that is still interesting, even at second hand:

"The first 'press view' of the Royal Academy supplies one of the most amusing recollections in Mr. T. H. S. Escott's reminiscences. It was in the late 'sixties or early 'seventies. In the portion of the room where Mr. Escott chanced to be, the object of universal and reverent gaze was no chef-d'œuvre by Millais or Leighton, but a lady with an elongated countenance and an intellectual brow, who reminded one of the Cumæan Sibyl. Royal personages would have not been received with the respect that followed or preceded her wherever she went. The lady dropped a fragment of paper that might, Mr. Escott imagined, at one time have contained a sandwich. Quick as a thought, a Cambridge don, smooth-shaven, ashen-hued, darted forward, snatched up the precious relic, placed it in his pocketbook, and pressed it adoringly to that part of his person where his heart may have been. At a respectful distance there came behind a short, sturdy, middle-aged beau, whom, long after, Mr. Escott came to know as Robert Browning. The poet stopped short, and in tones of confidential devotion said to a great painter by his side: 'She,' meaning the lady, 'has the nose of Dante, the mouth of Savonarola, and the mind of Plato.' Awe-stricken, the painter reprovingly rejoined: 'Hush! She speaks!' That was the first time Mr. Escott saw George Eliot."

Illicit whisky stills in the mountains of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia are said to number 10,000, about 30,000 people being concerned in the "industry."

WORKS OF THE TURK.

For months past the news of the Turkish atrocities in Asia Minor has been trickling through, says the Manchester Guardian. In the last few days Dr. M. H. Ward, one of the courageous band of American relief workers in the Near East, has been supplying detailed evidence of the horrors which he has personally witnessed. The details are almost unnecessary. The forced marching of droves of women and children through hundreds of miles of mountainous and barren country for the deliberate purpose of killing them by slow exhaustion conjures up a picture the details of which are perhaps best left to the imagination.

Dr. Ward himself can not have seen the worst, for his station was far from Bitlis, the supposed ultimate destination of these helpless pilgrims. What tiny fraction of them reaches Bitlis, or what happens to them when they get there, no one knows. All that is known is that they do not return. Since the policy is one of deliberate extermination, the best that can be hoped for them is a quick death. There is no check upon the horrors perpetrated in the remote fastnesses of the interior. There is little enough check even in the districts where there are relief workers to witness them. For the Turk is almost completely indifferent to what the world thinks of him. What, then, is the use of the commission of inquiry which the British government has undertaken? So far as the force of public opinion goes, the commission, it is to be feared, can do little. It can discover and publish the facts, but it can not by that means alone stop the massacre. Still, it is right that the facts should be put beyond question, and whatever weight their publication carries with the Angora government should be allowed to make itself felt before the process of extermination is complete.

We are glad to see that the American government has agreed to serve on the commission, and we hope that its work will now be pushed ahead with all possible speed. But the chief check upon the Angora government must undoubtedly be political. The massacres have already made it far harder for the Western powers to consent to any political arrangement which involves Turkish domination over Christian minorities. Their continuance while the commission was conducting its inquiries would so inflame public opinion that one can hardly conceive the guarantees for the protection of minorities that would be thought adequate. The Angora government must know this. For this reason, too, the commission should not lose a moment. If its inquiries should induce the Turks, for fear of the political consequences, to stay their hands from massacre for a few months, there may yet be time for the Western powers to discover the terms of a political settlement which will make a repetition of these horrors forever impossible.

An Elephant in London

Elephant-riding is one of the favorite diversions of English children in the London Zoological Gardens, and one of the minor sorrows of the war in England was the shortage of elephant transport for children, says the Living Age. The sorrows of the British youngsters reached as far as India, and the Maharajah of Cooch Behar presented the gardens with a tame she-elephant trained for driving.

Last year the elephant obediently carried a daily burden of little boys and little girls; but when she was taken out for a trial trip this spring she began to show signs of temperament. She did not like the new steps that had been provided for mounting her. It was beyond the power of any one in the gardens to make the elephant stand beside those steps. Then the old steps were brought out and the elephant consented to do her duty. But one day she struck again. Having deposited one load of children, her elephantship declined to receive any more. It is reliably reported that the puzzled attendants of the Zoological Gardens murmured to themselves a line of Shakespeare's: "The elephant hath joints, but none for courtesy." This elephant simply would not kneel.

Finally, as a last resort, a professional mahout was brought from India. He addressed the elephant in a language to which she was accustomed, and there has never been any trouble since.

Limiting Motor Truck Loads.

The Massachusetts highway commission is seriously considering the reduction of the maximum motor truck load permissible on the highways of that state to 20,000 pounds, including truck and load. Such was the statement made by James W. Synan of the Massachusetts highway commission at the recent meeting of the National Highway Traffic Association. Mr. Synan said that an extensive plan of road-building was under way in his state, but as it would take several years for the best type of roads to catch up with the existing highway transport conditions, it might be necessary to reduce the present legal weights until such time as the state roads could sustain the steadily increasing heavy traffic. The proposed limitation would prohibit the use of a motor truck exceeding five tons capacity.

Pencil Superstitions.

Carpenters always use flat lead pencils, as is well known, and the popular belief is that they are made especially this shape to prevent them rolling off the bench—an exasperating trick to the man of shavings, which might spoil his job. The reason for the flat pencil is, however, that it forms a handy flat rule in cases of emergency.

What seems at first sight a curious fad among cinema reviewers is that they always insist upon using very soft B.B.B.'s. However, there is a reason for this. The notes of the film man are made in the dark, and very often he finds it difficult to make out afterwards what he has written unless he uses a very soft pencil easy to write with.

Artists, of course, nearly always carry a soft pencil with them. Sir William Orpen's favorite lead is a half-length one, yellow in color outside, over which he crooks his fingers as he sketches upon the tablecloth.

There is a queer superstition in Ireland that a broken pencil-point is the precursor of a domestic jar; and an old-fashioned rule inculcated into shorthand writers was to sharpen a pencil at both ends in case of a breakage during the taking down of important verbatim notes.

The evacuation of Belleek on April 10th was, according to our correspondent, purely voluntary on the part of the Northern government's police, and the Free State troops readily agreed to their request for leave to take their armored cars through Free State territory. Mr. Collins contends that the Free State troops at Belleek did not invade Northern territory. The question whether he is right or wrong is the question that has to be decided.

That the Six Counties government have their own case against Sinn Fein is perfectly true. Mr. De Valera's party helped to wreck the conciliation movement by putting on an Ulster blockade as a move in their party game against Mr. Collins. The irregulars who murder in the name of Sinn Fein, and do all they can to foment disorder, are a curse both to Ulster and to Ireland. The anti-Catholic pogroms, if the most revolting and the most disgraceful feature of the public life of Belfast, are part of a barbarous warfare which lives on the quarrels of the two Irelands.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS..... 4

remembered. Part of the preamble speaks of "the employment of men who choose to accept employment under the terms of the decision and who have the same indisputable right to work that others have to decline to work"; whence he proceeds to direct all persons "to refrain from interference with the lawful efforts to maintain interstate transportation and the carrying of the United States mails," and continues: "These activities and the maintained supremacy of the law are the first obligation of the government and all the citizenship of our country." That is doctrine whose soundness is eternal, and it should be pondered by those weak-minded theorists who feel that the changes of time and of what they conceive to be public sentiment have in some mysterious way nullified fundamental human rights and the wisdom of supporting them as an essential governmental policy.

It is pleasant to have something agreeable to record about Senator Borah—there has been so little of that nature in his recent senatorial activities. He announces a campaign for the pruning of the political plum tree, to result, it is to be hoped, in a diminution of taxes; and he begins by offering a bill to cut the membership of the Shipping Board from seven to three, thereby saving $48,000 a year in salaries. He says that this is but the first of a series of such measures he intends to propose, to put an end to soft jobs involving a waste of a great deal of money annually.

We have no doubt that great savings could be accomplished by a courageous course of elimination, and it is not Senator Borah's courage that has ever been brought in question. He has plenty of it, whether his colleagues have or not. Some little start has been made toward a reduction of governmental expenses, notably by the Budget Committee, under General Dawes; and the Secretary of the Treasury has recently announced a reduction of $1,014,000,000 in the public debt for the fiscal year ending June 30th. The situation has been helped by a larger aggregate of receipts than had been originally estimated, both from the customs and from internal revenue, but while these larger receipts have resulted in a shrinkage of the national debt this does not necessarily mean a reduction of taxation. The country appears to be filled with sociologists and so-called constructive reformers who lie awake the long nights through thinking up plans for instituting new government bureaus to preside over the normal activities of life—to bail out the public money in maternity pensions, for example, or to get rid of one hundred million dollars per year through the multitudinous channels of a Federal department of education. One group is beginning to talk about "socializing" hospitals and the practice of medicine; so that before we know it we may have to depend entirely on political doctors, and nurses with pulls.

The paternalistic regulation and supervision of life not only costs liberty, but it also costs money, which is a kind of cost that may appeal to more people; and paternalism is coming upon us foot, horse and guns, unless we prepare for resistance. Under such conditions it is almost dangerous to have a department of the Treasury publish the information that the country's debt has been diminished from $23,977,000,000 on June 30, 1921, to $22,963,000,000 on June 30, 1922, or to call attention to the fact that that debt when at its peak was $26,596,000,000. We all remember the character in "Bleak House" who, whenever he forebore to squander a certain sum of money, considered that he had made that much and so could afford to spend it and a little bit over. And for our bureaucrats to learn that any money at all is being saved, or that the public debt is shrinking, is to hold out to them an almost resistless temptation to invent new activities, new governmental functions, new boards and bureaus for child development, for training youth, for studying the bumps on criminals' heads, for teaching girls to make biscuits, for investigating school histories, for doing a hundred other things the government was never devised to do, in order to build a "constructive" programme of political meddling with individual life.

We do not know that Senator Borah is right when he says that the Shipping Board can get along with three members instead of seven for what he calls "presiding over the decrepit days of this money-losing, money-squandering affair," but we do know that he is right in his general undertaking to prune the plum tree. Inasmuch as it was too well watered during the war and stimulated by much artificial fertilizer to a tropical overgrowth, it will stand a great deal of pruning. We would not mourn if he chopped the old thing down. Let him start a movement to reduce the number of bureaus by reducing the number of socialistic governmental functions, and he will, as the French have it, "deserve well of his country."

It has been generally taken for granted that certain results of the recent primaries in darkest North Dakota, where Senator McCumber slipped his grip on a senatorial position he had held for twenty-four years, indicated and confirmed a general slide toward radicalism—notwithstanding the fact that North Dakota could hardly grow any more radical than it has been without importing part of the red army from Russia. But observers informed about parties and blocs and general political conditions there are convinced that exactly the opposite conclusion should follow; that North Dakota is not growing more radical, but less so.

McCumber appears to have outlived a large part of his popularity, for more than one reason. First, a United States senator is to a considerable extent an absentee; and a man who has been at Washington as long as McCumber has, with the brief intervals of fence-mending permitted by the service, is likely to find that his fences need a good many more new rails than he has time to split and place. Second, the tariff bill that bears his name grows less beautiful to the farmers the longer they contemplate it; and North Dakota is composed almost entirely of farmers. Third, McCumber has made a bid for favor by espousing the soldiers' bonus raid, that needless and sorry effort to cash the valor and patriotism and spirituality of American youth. Fourth, he has pursued almost a hands-off policy about the growth of radicalism in his state; the usual attitude of the politician when confronted by a situation calling for the courageous assertion of abstract principle; so that while he could not be supported with enthusiasm by the cult of agricultural discontent, he was of even less use to the conservative element that was trying to redeem the state and that did redeem the governorship from Lynn Frazier by recalling him. It now looks as though these same independents had traded off McCumber for the success of their state ticket. It is said that the Republicans among them do not care a tinker's dam for McCumber. What they want is to beat Frazier, and their chance is in the other party.

To interpret McCumber's defeat as another victory for radicalism is too facile, and itself reflects an unreflecting view. More of the field should be surveyed, when it will appear that a strong conservative bloc, including Democrats and Republicans, has accomplished the nomination on the Democratic ticket of J. F. T. O'Connor, one of the leaders in the movement that resulted in Frazier's recall, over the more radical F. O. Hellstrom, who now complains that he has been jobbed by an iniquitous (all successful opposition is iniquitous) bi-partisan movement—just such a movement as the Non-Partisan Leaguers have been staging for a long time, and through which they came originally into control of the Republican organization in North Dakota.

He intimates that the independents packed the Democratic primary, and he wants an injunction to keep O'Connor from being declared the Democratic nominee. McCumber, in the other party, talks much in the same vein. He has issued a letter stating that he was beaten because he was opposed by a bi-partisan movement, the independents, and a non-partisan organization, the leaguers.

The cleavage in North Dakota is no longer between the parties, but across them. The truth seems to be that the Non-Partisan League, the grotesque child of those strange immortals, Norse mysticism and agrarian discontent, is beginning to disclose its hereditary weaknesses. The independents, or conservatives, claim the victory, though not within the Republican ranks. They beat Frazier last October, and they say they will beat him again next November, and the gates of Hell shall not prevail against them. Of course, it is problematic, and prediction is dangerous to authority unless authority can depend, like Father Ricard, on its unsuccessful essays being forgotten. Frazier may win McCumber's place; but he has not won it by winning the Republican nomination, and with a strong opponent to rally the conservative forces of his distracted state there is a good chance that he will meet defeat at the same hands that defeated him in the recall election. In that case all the interpretations of the McCumber defeat as a radical victory will be invalidated. It would be too bad to see a Republican beaten by a Democrat, but there would be two consolations about it in this case. First, to commit an obvious bull, it could not happen in this case because Frazier is not a real Republican; and second, if it has to happen anywhere, North Dakota is the right place.

Paternalism.

Can any good thing come out of Tammany Hall? We have long doubted that any good thing could, but on July 4th, Tammany Hall at least supplied a rostrum for Senator Stanley, a Democrat from the state where the legislature almost repealed evolution, to warn his audience and the people of the nation against those vicious and perverting tendencies toward paternalistic government to which the Argonaut has recently felt it a duty to call the attention of its readers. Senator Stanley's statements, though clothed with oratorical exaggeration, and bearing, perhaps, too heavily upon the principle of centralization in the Federal government, which is another though closely allied subject, are worthy the attention of every citizen who feels that it is better to check the growth of evils than try to abolish them after long establishment.

Senator Stanley clearly sees that certain vital principles of American polity are being forgotten and abandoned. The spirit of individualism that animated the pioneers and the patriots of generations but recently passed, and that built the institutions of this country on foundations so sound and sure that we have attained a national prosperity beyond that of any people in the world, is not only neglected, but it is aggressively attacked. Its principal assailants are to be found among certain well-meaning "progressives" who lack the vision to understand that real progress is of the people, not of the politicians. The Kentucky Senator says of these busybodies:

Their energy and ingenuity are in the main directed to the discovery of some new method by which a centralized and omnipotent power may extend its inquisitorial authority. Weddings are to be supervised by hygienic experts and marital rights determined by eugenics. Babies are to be born by Federal authority and suckled under Federal supervision. You can not milk a cow without a Federal inspector at your heels. The factory, the mill, the counting house, the office and the home literally swarm with a horde of petty and pestiferous representatives of the paternalistic régime.

This is old-fashioned talk, and fundamentally it is as sound as Plymouth Rock. No virile people can look with patience upon the efforts of meddlers to suppress the rights and propensities of the individual and turn over the direction of private life to a lot of governmental bureaus. That was not the way of our on-coming. It was not the principle of American progress. It is the mode of Germany, which it brought first to despotism and then to ruin. It is the principle of Asia, where the ruler is everything and the subject nothing. It is of the social habit of the Japanese, among whom the individual is the property of the Son of Heaven and so abjectly subordinated to his commune that he must leave his door unlocked at night in order that he may have no private life which his neighbors may not at any time invade and inspect; or so at least it was in the time of Hearn.

It is likely that Senator Stanley takes a little too narrow a view of things when he identifies this German-Asiatic drift in American life with the tendency to concentrate more and more power in the Federal government. We have recently seen, it is true, a tendency at Washington toward the formation of too many bureaus and a disposition in the states to depend upon the Federal government for too much assistance in carrying out what ought to be state and local enterprises; but the disposition to sacrifice the rights and liberties of the individual to the community is not confined to the field of Federal relations. The vice has broken out in our state and town governments. President Harding says: "It will be a sorry day when group domination is reflected in our laws." But that day is in many respects already upon us. Group domination asserts itself in cities, where, in order that people might live in close proximity, it has been necessary that the individual should sacrifice some of the freedom he once possessed when his family was an isolated unit on the open prairie. But such necessity has been exceeded by many particular regulations of conduct and of property use, for objects not fundamental but merely æsthetic and often of imaginary benefit. So-called city-planning has run wild and city requirements have been stretched beyond legitimate bounds. Neighbors have grown unwilling to stand anything from one another in the form of the most insignificant nuisances, but want everything prescribed and regulated by ordinance. Mothers want their children amused in kindergartens when they are small and taught cooking in colleges when they are grown. Here and there is a spasm of reaction against this sort of excessive regulation and restraint and governmental ordering of life, but the reaction will not be general enough to do much good until the people as a whole realize that a great deal that is called progress is just a new form of despotic meddling with human rights. Our forefathers would have resented it. We shall throw away our heritage of personal freedom if we continue to promote it.

The New Criminology.

One swallow does not make a drunkard, and the question whether prohibition has or has not diminished crime is not to be answered by an individual instance; yet the life story of "Frisco Tommy," former safecracker, as related to the class in criminology at the University of California (it will surprise some taxpayers to learn that they are maintaining such a course) may well encourage the prohibitionists. Its place here is owing entirely to its lack of a moral; it is the least moral story we have met in a long time.

According to Frisco Tommy a policeman friend pointed out to him he could make more money as a bootlegger than by cracking safes, and the liquid used was less dangerous, provided one did not drink from his own stock. So Tommy stopped pouring "soup" into drill holes in steel doors and took to running rum. He felt immeasurably elevated. And his new calling brought him into contact with some of our very best people. In fact, he became intimately acquainted with many of our leading citizens, so he told the pupils. He had established new social contacts and acquired new soul experiences. It was, he said, the first opportunity that had ever come to him to know that there were honest persons in the world who really amounted to something. And from the example of his customers, from the evident satisfactions of their well-ordered lives, as long as they were supplied with plenty of his commodity, he became enamored of an honest career. He saw for the first time the moral sublimity of serving his fellows.

He now had a mission, whereas he had been a criminal, despised of men, mistrusted by himself, and hunted by the law. He would have no more of it. He resolved that as long as prohibition made it worth his while to continue in the booze business, he would never crack another safe.

And we do not know that he has. Psychologists of some of our psychologicalized police departments, as well as our students of criminology at the University, have in his case a subject for the most profitable speculation—and so has Frisco Tommy; at least his speculations have been of that nature, according to his own statement. His reformation is one of the astounding phenomena of sociology—although the materialists in the department of political economy profess to see nothing strange about a professional man deserting his profession for one that pays better. They say it happens every day. However that may be, as Macaulay so often remarks, Tommy is reformed, and the police of every city in America can breathe easier, for at blending and rectifying "soup" he was an adept, and they much prefer that he devote his skill to blending and rectifying spirits, since that activity is under Federal jurisdiction. To his reform the prohibitionists can "point with pride," for if it had not been for them he would still be blowing safes. There does not appear to be any other moral to the story, and there seems to be something the matter with this one—in fact it is, as we remarked above, the least moral story we have heard for some time. Some ways you look at it, it seems to support the cause of prohibition, but not in a moral manner, strictly speaking. The whole thing is so confusing, and we don't know what the students learned from it. We move it be referred to the professor of ethics, department of philosophy.

Protection for the Sensitive.

As strikes multiply it becomes daily more evident that stern measures must be taken to protect strikers unless they are to surrender their fundamental right to strike and rely upon mere polite requests for that dubious commodity known as "social justice." If we may take the word of union representatives for it, the practices of those inconsiderate persons that take the places of strikers are becoming more provocative and violent every day, and unless the sensitive strikers are protected they may be driven away by rude words and violent deeds from the mines and railroad yards where they are endeavoring to settle their differences with their recent employers by means of a little arson and dynamite. They are entitled to the protection of the laws, and no spineless governor should deprive them of it for fear of the resentment of unorganized and floating labor.

No one knows what might have happened to the striking miners of Williamson County, Illinois, great state of Grant and Lincoln as its citizens so fervently sing, if they had not resolutely defended themselves. In that case the strike-breakers gave up their arms with intention to deceive and delude the on-coming strikers, but these poor men were fortunately shrewd. Then, with diabolical invention, the strike-breakers ran up a white flag, signal of surrender, which, it was at once perceived, was done with malicious intent to lull the strikers into fancied security so the strike-breakers could get them in their evil power. Failing in that, because the strikers quickly saw through the trick and captured them, the strike-breakers tied themselves together in groups of six, in the mad effort to provoke their captors into reprehensible acts that would bring discredit on them and their cause. But against this contemptible trick and device the strikers manfully defended themselves by shooting down their unruly prisoners, and the coroner's jury put the blame on the hard-hearted coal mine owners who would hire such villains as the victims to do their dirty work of mining coal.

We have had another instance of this evil propensity on the part of the strike-breakers at Roseville, near Sacramento, where they were committing the heinous crime of icing fruit cars. Here, we are told by the union leaders, an engineer named Goulard was shot, though rather mildly, by one of the gun-men of the railroad company. The alleged disposition to hire all the best workmen killed off by contrast as soon as industrial trouble starts is one to be resisted with all the forces of society. No one can look with indifference on these attacks upon strikers and strike sympathizers. And this one was probably owing entirely to the neglect of Governor Stephens to send the militia to the scene. He supposed the strikers were perfectly safe under the protection of the sheriff. He was wrong. The sheriff can not watch everything. Greatly as he desires to save strikers the humiliation of seeing other men working in the places where they no longer wish to work, well as he recognizes his solemn duty of protecting them against the mob violence of the workers, he can not be everywhere at once. He should have help.

As soon as a strike is called the governor should put the militia into the field for the protection of the strikers against their assailants and detractors. No striker should be subject to insult, much less to physical attack, by the employees of the company. They should be safe, and they should have every assurance of considerate treatment while burning cars and round-houses, or indulging in any other of their accustomed activities under the circumstances. This is the governor's duty, in order to prevent insult, provocations to disorder, and the shooting of strikers by new employees. He can not evade it by passing the buck to Sheriff Gum. No sheriff of the yielding and amiable name of Gum (nor even Veale) should be left to deal alone with a lot of rough and truculent men determined on working and otherwise infuriating their fellows. It is much better that the strikers be defended by the constituted authorities, in the regular and legal way, than that they be forced to defend themselves at the risk of their lives, or at the risk of having some unappreciative corner's jury misunderstand them and call them murderers, as might have happened in Illinois. If men have a right to strike, they certainly have a right to be protected while doing it, and the government should not leave it to the sheriffs, who, if the strikes multiply, will soon have all they can do putting red padlocks on doors.

Editorial Notes.

There is a man in this city who relieves his fits of depression by buying files in a fifteen-cent store—a file a fit. He says things can't be so horribly wrong with the country when you can buy a good-sized file for fifteen cents. He is an economist. But the merchant who keeps the hardware shop next door says it is a terrible thing that a good-sized file can be bought for fifteen cents (although he would be willing to buy them wholesale at that much a dozen). He is a business man. There is another man who says nobody should be permitted to buy a file at any price except a mechanic. He is a trades unionist. Which one is right?

About the only strikers that appear reasonably safe from the inroads of strike-breakers in the present world confusion are the Constantinople eunuchs. They have gone on strike against the twenty-four-hour day and the ceaseless vigilance imposed by the harem service. Their lot has indeed been a hard one, compared to which that of a steel worker laboring twelve hours would appear happy. But when a steel worker strikes some one else may take his job, whereas a eunuch appears to enjoy a monopoly. The employers have considered filling their places with broken Russian noblemen, but thus far the aforesaid noblemen have been totally unprepared to pass the preliminary examinations.

Alarms will never cease. The San Francisco women's meeting to promote the candidacy of Senator Johnson has sought to terrorize the people of California by a proclamation reading in part: "We do not deny to any person the right to seek Hiram Johnson's office. That is a constitutional privilege given to every elector. But we do feel that California would suffer irretrievably if she permitted Hiram Johnson to be defeated." This, we repeat, is sheer terrorism. It is not fair to subject a community already agitated by industrial unrest to these sudden shocks of fright. The effect of this sort of warning upon expectant mothers, and babes yet unborn, is likely to be too terrible, and that is a thing we should have expected the embattled feminine supporters of our senior senator to consider.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Constructive Comment.

SONORA, CAL., July 7, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Your article in the Argonaut of July 1, 1922, entitled "The Senatorial Contest," commands the respect and attention due constructive criticism of a disgusting political situation arising from the Hearst-Johnson combination. Whenever California senatorial candidates descend to Hearst's level politically, that is the time for retiring them from public service.

If I am given the opportunity C. C. Moore will receive one vote from Tuolumne County. That will be my own. Personally, I'm not interested in politics other than that decency should predominate in the public service; and mountebanks of the Hearst stripe should be relegated to the obscurity in which they belong.

Your paper has my warmest commendation for the brave stand it takes on all of the important questions continually arising to befuddle civilization. Yours respectfully,

C. R. WATSON.

It has been estimated that 14 cents out of every dollar taken in is required to maintain a grocery, 26 cents to maintain a shoe store, and 28 cents for a drug store. If you don't like to pay it, try buying from the farmer, the wholesaler, or the factory.

"SUCCESS" AT LOS ANGELES.

City Sells Cheap Electric Power Because the General Public Pays in Additional Taxes.

The following observations on the proposed Water and Power Amendment to the Constitution of California, are from a recent statement by John D. Galloway, consulting engineer:

The Water and Power Amendment will, if carried out, cause a violent change in our economic life and will bring on financial loss and suffering where now there is well being above that of any land on the round earth. Beyond this, and transcending all other considerations, it proposes an adventure into state socialism, which if adopted will nullify the work of the men of past generations who have fought throughout the ages to make mankind free. From every point of view—economic, social or political—the measure is without merit and should be rejected by the people.

If the Water and Power Act is passed, competition of the state will destroy the work of municipal and private enterprise. Municipalities will stop their developments because of the sop thrown to them by funds expended by the state. Private companies will be driven out of business because they can not compete with state enterprises which have behind them the right of condemnation and monopoly and the power to tax private companies to pay for the deficits created by state inefficiency. As the work of developing the state is now going forward under private agencies, there is no need for the state to attempt the work. The Water and Power Act is wholly superfluous and unnecessary.

But, say the advocates of this bill, the state can do this work in a better and cheaper way than it is now being done—it can borrow money cheaper, it acts with more authority and can over-ride obstacles to projects that now lie dormant because the people will not act together. All of these are mere assumptions which the experience of the past cries out are false. It is true that California has good credit at present, but it is equally true that when the proposed mountain of debt has been incurred and the debauch of spending the half billion dollars has commenced, the credit of this state will not be what it now is.

Before examining the claim of the advocates of the bill that the state can do things in a better and cheaper way, I wish to warn those who listen or read against the evil that lies in their arguments when they compare conditions that are wholly dissimilar. "See what they have done in Ontario," "Look at the cheap power furnished by the city of Los Angeles," cry the partisans of the bill. Such statements as are issued have in them a few grains of fact in a bushel of misstatements.

It will be well to pause for a moment and call attention to the water aqueduct and power development at Los Angeles, which is claimed to be an example of municipal management that justifies the proposed action by the state. The physical construction, in design, boldness of conception, and execution, is worthy of all praise. But when this municipal enterprise is used as an argument for the state going into business, an examination must be made of the working conditions to see if the situation is at all comparable. Attention is called to some of these points.

The water that feeds the power plants is brought to them by the aqueduct, built by the city and now operated by the Water Bureau. This aqueduct, about 240 miles in length, cost about $24,000,000. All operating, fixed and other charges are met by water rates and by direct taxation. Mr. Lee states that of the annual charges against water costs since the aqueduct was built, $15,459,000 has been met by direct taxation. No part of these costs have been entered against the Power Bureau, and hence do not have to be charged in the bills of consumers. Should the State of California go into the power business, the cost of its works for collecting, storing and bringing the water to the power plant would have to be met by charges in the power bills. As such cost may run from 30% to 50% of the total cost of developing power up to the plant switch-board, any comparison between Los Angeles power and state power is impossible as long as the city does not enter such costs into its power bills. This item alone completely vitiates any argument based on the Los Angeles experiment. Again, any fair comparison of water rates charged consumers in any other city with Los Angeles is impossible when in the short life of the aqueduct over $15,000,000 has been raised by direct taxation to meet expenses. The total amount collected in taxes on account of interest, sinking fund and other charges pertaining to the Water Department is $18,404,163.00.

The Power Bureau has distributed only a minor portion of its energy over its own lines. The energy from city plants has mainly been delivered over the distribution system and under the operation of the Southern California Edison Company. In other words, the most difficult and by far the most expensive part of the power business has been carried out under the efficient management of, and on the works constructed by, a private company. This again makes any comparison with state operation impossible because comparable conditions do not exist.

Like the Water Bureau, the Power Bureau has been forced to direct taxation to assist it in meeting its charges. Up to June 30, 1921, $5,465,414.34 had been raised in this manner, against which the Bureau had refunded $605,000. A more recent statement shows that up to June 30th of this year, direct taxation to meet interest and sinking fund charges will amount to $5,906,011.74, but the refund is not given. In a private company this would amount to an assessment on stockholders and the rates would have to make provision for returns on the investment capital if new works had been built from the proceeds. In municipal accounting this is rarely or never done, the attitude being that taxes once collected and spent, like dead men, tell no tales. Borrowed money alone is considered in making rates. In effect it is a subsidy, furnished to the users of power by taxing all the people. Identical action is contemplated in the Water and Power Act, which provides that deficits may be made up by direct taxation. Under such an arrangement, with direct taxation to fall back upon and no addition to capital account upon which rates are to be based, any and all municipal enterprises can be made a success, if you want to call increased taxation a success. They simply can not fail.

By use of the threat of condemnation, the Southern California Edison Company was forced into an agreement to sell its distribution system to the city. This sale was consummated on May 15th last. The price paid was $12,044,000, which must be added to the cost of the city enterprise. The private company has been driven from the city, which now has a practical monopoly. Similar arbitrary and unjust action is predicted if the Water and Power Act goes into effect, for the Board is given the right to take, on five days' notice, any property that it may desire, and its own action is made evidence of the superior right. No Oriental sultan, no Caesar or Napoleon, ever dreamed of a more arbitrary use of unrestrained authority.

In any power system, it is necessary to have, at the end of the lines from the mountains, one or more large steam power plants, the purpose of which is to provide service in case of accident to the power lines, to help carry peak loads, and to provide power when the streams are low. If the state goes into the power business it will have to do the same. In San Francisco, the steam plants have a capacity of nearly 75% of the demand on the power system. The construction and maintenance of such steam plants is a large item of the cost of power. Los Angeles has relied on the private company for its emergency service. This again makes a correct comparison with any other project impossible.

The Power Bureau at Los Angeles practically serves a city only. It is well recognized that the concentrated population of a city is a much better field for power revenue than the population in the country. As a matter of fact, policy has dictated that country rates for power should be made as low as possible and the city should make up the difference. The state would have to take the lean with the fat. The Los Angeles Power Bureau has the cream of the business. Deductions as to what the state might do in the matter of cheap rates are not possible in this case.

The Power Bureau pays no municipal or state taxes and no Federal income tax. Under the operating agreement with the Edison Company, that company paid, up to April 30, 1922, $1,152,810.39 taxes to the state. On business done directly by the City, the state tax would have been $155,034, the total being $1,307,844.39. Had the city distributed this power the state treasury would have lost this much money. Now that the distribution system has passed to the city, the state treasury will lose about $400,000 annually—an amount that will increase year by year.

To this extent the thrifty citizens of that active city have slipped out from under the load of state expenses that go to maintain their schools, the state roads, insane asylums, and the ninety and nine odd commissions that we indulge in. To those who are not informed, it can be told that state taxes are collected on the gross revenue of corporations, but they should not deceive themselves into thinking that the corporations really pay the taxes. No corporation could pay its share of our state taxes and exist. It merely passes them on, as it does all other costs, to the ultimate consumer. The ultimate consumer pays all cost. The state by taking over all the power business, can relieve that kind of enterprise of about $4,000,000 annually. If it does, the people will have to make up the deficit in another way.

Thus, Los Angeles, by omitting from its costs sums of money raised by direct taxation amounting to millions; by charging to the water users all the cost of developing and conveying the water to its power plants and paying for it in water rates or direct taxation; by driving out of the city its private competitor and dispossessing it of its distribution system; by taking only the cream of the power business in a large city; by depending upon the private company for power and for emergency service from the private steam plants; by making up its deficits by direct taxation, and by avoiding all state and national taxation, can supply power cheaper than a private company. Almost anyone could do it under such conditions. Power is cheap in Los Angeles to manufacturers and other users, but the people pay the bill in water rates and direct taxation. The people of the rest of the state assist in the good work. What Los Angeles does is the concern of that city alone, but in all honesty the advocates of the Water and Power Act should omit from their arguments this case of municipal methods.

I repeat that arguments for or against any project such as the proposed act, based on comparisons that do not take account of physical and other differences such as mentioned above, are essentially misleading, dangerous and dishonest. This criticism is valid because the so-called arguments are based on cost of service.

VOICES FROM THE PRESS.

CONJURING DIFFICULTIES.

(Philadelphia Bulletin.)

In connection with the suggestion that Sweden may ask the United States to submit to the World Court at The Hague certain issues in controversy between the two nations, there has been an attempt to conjure up embarrassment to this government in such a request. It is assumed that submission of the case would involve in some way a recognition of the League of Nations, which this country could not consistently give.

But no such dilemma exists for Washington. The World Court is the legitimate successor of the original Hague Tribunal, whose palace it occupies; and of that court this country was a member and a champion. Not only did it hail its inception, but it furnished its first case, the Pious fund controversy between Mexico and the United States.

While technically, through the covenant, a part of the machinery of the League of Nations, the court has no essential connection with the league, to whose principle of political decision of world controversies the conception of judicial solution of those issues is in a sense the antithesis. And this idea of international judicial action is an essentially American idea, worked out for this very court by Elihu Root.

Whether or not the American controversies with Sweden, which involve shipping questions, are proper for judicial arbitration is a matter for the government to determine. If it decides that they are, there is no insurmountable reason why the government should not avail itself of the World Court, not as any appendage of the league, but as the machinery already at hand for international judicial action. In so doing it would be true to its own record and traditions.

OVERLOADING CONGRESS.

(New York Times.)

The House of Representatives, with the consent of the Senate, is to adjourn until August 15th. Meanwhile the Senate will remain in torrid and enervating Washington to wrestle with the tariff, while the bonus and the subsidy bill are still to come. That the House should have been able to clear up its calendar so far in advance of the Senate is partly due to the difference in the parliamentary rules of the two bodies. The House, with five times the membership of the Senate, is able to dispatch twice as many bills in half the time, because it has enabled itself to do business. The Senate keeps itself in the fetters of old rules which depended largely upon that courtesy between gentlemen, and that comity between parties, which have largely ceased to exist.

Behind this explanation, which is only partial, there lies a larger cause of the confusion and uncertainty which attend the work of Congress. It has too much to do. Its business increases from year to year at an accelerated rate. One result is that Congress is kept in almost perpetual session. The recesses once customary in the long term of Congress, running as they did from June or July to December, have become impossible. Too many bills are pressed upon Congress. Each succeeding administration has too elaborate a programme of legislation. Different measures are all the time fighting for precedence, and the inevitable consequence is that many of them have to be jettisoned at the end of the congressional voyage. Then there arise fresh complaints of the inefficiency of Congress.

It is not a matter for recrimination between political parties. The Democrats can not from their own glass house throw stones at the Republicans. The evil referred to affects both parties, and has long been growing, no matter which one was in power. Nor is it a question of the comparative rank in statesmanship of one Congress over against another. In native ability and legislative experience representatives and senators do not vary so greatly from one year to another. But the system under which they work, the pressure put upon them, the impossible demands made of them, appear often to be of such a nature that not even supermen could do all that is expected of them. The people look to the government for too many things. They seek to lay upon Congress tasks which should be attended to by state legislatures or county authorities or municipalities. It is admitted that Congress does its work badly, but it is not generally perceived that this is inevitable when a labor is thrust upon it too great for its powers.

Thoughtful men in Washington, students of government everywhere, have been impressed by the heightening difficulties which come from piling too many burdens upon the shoulders of Congress. It has staggered along like an overloaded horse. Various devices for relieving it have been suggested, and some of them have been tried. But in actual experience they have not been entirely satisfactory. The plan of a Federal budget was counted upon to save Congress both time and vexation of spirit, but thus far in effect it has done neither. Then there was that ambitious plan of governmental reorganization, dear to the heart of President Harding. He has had a vigorous administrator at work on it for nearly a year, but so great has been the friction developed, so acute the jealousy between departments, so pronounced the opposition even in the Cabinet, that the President has regretfully been compelled to pigeon-hole the whole project for the time being.

THE COMIC RECALL.

(Philadelphia Public Ledger.)

One feature of the Republican primary election in North Dakota has escaped some of the attention that ought to have been given it because of the interest that attached to Senator McCumber's defeat. That feature is the extraordinary working of that noble instrument of reform, the recall.

Ex-Governor Lynn J. Frazier, who defeated McCumber, has not had an "ex" before his title very long. A few months ago he was governor, the man whom the people delighted to honor. His term did not come to a peaceful end by the normal finish of a certain number of years; no, he was yanked forth violently from his gubernatorial seat by an indignant people, to whom he had become anathema. In other words, the recall was applied to him, most salutary and deadly of radical weapons, and the North Dakotans bounced him out of the governorship without waiting for his term to end.

Now again, in a few short months, he becomes the man the people delight to honor, and beats a senator who has served his state and country pretty well, on the whole, for nearly a quarter of a century. The recall could not be made more ridiculous. How soon will North Dakota be in bouncing Senator Frazier and even electing ex-Senator McCumber? The recall is not only funny in itself, but is the cause of mirth in nearly everybody but the Non-Partisan League.

Of course, it may be said that all North Dakota joined in recalling Governor Frazier, while only the Republicans have colloqued in nominating him for senator. But that means nothing. Party lines have been obliterated in North Dakota or are merely used as conveniences. Senator Ladd, for instance, merely uses the Republican name to enter the Republican caucus, and justifies himself on the ground that in matters of no importance he votes with the Republicans. On all other questions, on those that are of importance, he is as likely to be a Democrat as a Republican, and the people clearly understood that fact when they elected him, and elected him for that reason. Hence did nominal Democrats vote for him.

The matter goes a little deeper. If the recall is thus shown up as a mad caper of politics—and it has been so shown up in many cases besides this latest one—how many more of these radical nostrums, not so comic, are yet as meaningless and dangerous? Is it quite certain even now that Hamilton, Madison, Pinckney, Thomson and their colleagues of 1787 were not up to date when they deliberately chose representative government in place of direct popular government?

My Butterflies.

(This was one of the last poems written by the late Henry Rowland-Brown ("Oliver Grey"), the well-known entomologist, whose two books of verse were warmly welcomed by W. S. Gilbert and Andrew Lang.)

A cabinet of butterflies—

"Fond useless toys," you say,

But, every one to me a prize

Made dearer day by day

As the years go by, and summer hours

Vanish with brief delay.

For each, "a thing of beauty rare

Is a joy for ever and aye."

So sang divine Euripides,

And true are his words of gold,

And every butterfly sleeping here

Can a dream of delight unfold.

Visions of Alpine solitudes,

And cataracts pouring cold

Through glacier gardens aster-starred,

The dark Erebia hold.

Chrysophanus with wings of flame

The marshlands of Garonne

Brings back, where I have wandered far

Contented and alone

With Nature; or where, day and night,

Broods from his golden throne

The Arctic sun on silent meres

Where never a sail is blown.

This line of shimmering "Azure Blues"

My heart with rapture fills;

Silver on blue, as the clouds themselves,

And edged with ermine frills.

Born memories of pensive hours

Among the gentle hills

And billowy downs of England

When Spring her balm distils.

These are the pined "Half-Mourners,"

No mourners sad for me;

For they conjure up the olive yards

And the blue Ægean Sea

Where Vardar comes down singing

To the dusty plains and free,

The winds of heaven make music

On the heights of Basile.

Right royal on bright vermillion

And orange pinions borne

"Aurora of Provence" reflects

The saffron-tinted morn,

Where the wine-dark Mediterranean

Sighs ever a song forlorn

And high in the scented pine trees

The zephyrs wind their horn.

Or I gaze on the "Emperor" laid in state,

In his iris robes, and clear

A vista of green oak-forest breaks

On my sense, and far and near

The fairy flutes and violins

Of the insect choir I hear . . .

The voice of summer among the leaves

Made one with the perfect year.

The leaves must fall, the roses fade,

The daffodils will not stay,

The flashing diadem of the dawn

Dims into twilight grey;

But you, my butterflies, as of old,

Your glory still display,

Though long the little spark of life

Has burnt itself away.

Gather You.

Gather you, gather you, angels of God,

Freedom, and mercy, and truth;

Come, for the earth has grown coward and old,

Come down, and renew us her youth.

Wisdom, Self-sacrifice, Daring, and Love,

Haste to the battlefield, stoop from above,

To the day of the Lord at hand.

Gather you, gather you, hounds of hell,

Famine, and Plague, and War;

Idleness, Bigotry, Cant, and Misrule:

Gather and fall in the snare!

Hireling and Mammonite, Bigot and Knave,

Crawl to the battlefield, sneak to your grave,

In the day of the Lord at hand.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

The Hon. Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney-General of the United States, is regarded as the most active politician and party man in the Cabinet. Mr. Daugherty had been an Ohio lawyer for forty years when he entered the present Cabinet. In 1920 he was in charge of Mr. Harding's candidacy for the presidency.

Arthur B. Ruhl, who has recently been exploring the Western states and publishing his discoveries in Harper's Magazine, was a war correspondent on the Western front and at Gallipoli, his interesting dispatches having been published in Collier's. He is a graduate of Harvard and spent some time on the staff of the New York Evening Sun. He is the author of a history of track athletics in America.

H. M. Tomlinson, associate editor of the London Nation, was a war correspondent attached to British staff headquarters. His conscientious endeavors to see the big show close up for his readers took him too near the big guns, and resulted in deafness. Tomlinson served on the editorial staff of the Morning Leader, and of the Daily News when those papers were consolidated. He has published "The Sea and the Jungle," "Old Junk," and "London River." He was born in 1873.

Baron Leopold Plessen, third secretary of the German Embassy at Washington, is a nephew of Prince Herbert Bismarck, and of the Countess Camilla Hoyos. His mother, the former Baroness Plessen, now the wife of Charles Wilkins Short of Cincinnati, has a strong strain of English blood, being a granddaughter of the inventor of the Whitehead torpedo. She married Baron Plessen, a former attaché of the German Embassy to the Court of St. James, and the present third secretary to the German Embassy at Washington was born in England.

Mr. Herbert Haseltine, who was for some years an attaché of the American Embassy in Paris, has of late years been winning renown as a sculptor of animals. Mr. Haseltine is now in Spain, modeling some of the famous bulls of the late Duke of Alba's ganaderia. This artistic venture is in behalf of the Hispanic Museum of Madrid. He has also accepted a commission to model a trophy for the winner of the international polo tournament, and has just completed a miniature statue of Edward VII's charger, Kildare, for Queen Alexandra.

Ben W. Hooper, chairman of the United States Railroad Labor Board, is a former governor of Tennessee. He was admitted to the bar in Tennessee in 1894 and became a member of the legislature the following year. He was Assistant United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Tennessee from 1906 to 1910, and was governor for two terms, from 1911 to 1915, when he resumed his law practice. He is a Republican and a Baptist, and was the nominee of his party for the United States Senate in 1916, but was beaten by Kenneth McKellar, Democrat, of Memphis. Hooper was a captain in the Spanish-American war.

The Prince Jonah Kuhio Kalaniana'ole, who has recently been appointed chairman of an official committee to gather historical data on the Hawaiian Islands, is a second cousin to the late King Kalakaua. He was proclaimed a prince by royal decree in 1884. He was educated at Honolulu and in England, and was employed in the office of the minister of the interior, and in the customs department, of the former native kingdom. He was a delegate from Hawaii to the Congress of the United States in every session from the fifty-eighth to the sixty-sixth, and now lives at Waikiki, Honolulu. The prince is a nephew of Queen Kapiolani.

Mrs. Norman McLeod, formerly Elizabeth Wana-maker, is the founder and first president of a novel society in her state, known as the Pennsylvania Emergency Aid. This society produces funds for every sort of emergency that may occur in Pennsylvania, which without it might have to be collected by a number of unorganized agencies, requiring time and extra effort. Mrs. McLeod has been working for years on the perfecting of this organization, which is now represented to work as smoothly as any merely human contrivance of the sort can. While it supplies large sums for the relief of disasters, the drain on the individual members is slight, and the funds are on hand for prompt use. The founder is a devotee of art and music, and a persistent worker for a better Philadelphia.

Using an opaque substance to show the movement of the stomach walls by means of the X-ray was first practiced by Dr. Walter B. Cannon in the Harvard physiological laboratory in 1896. While studying digestion in this manner Dr. Cannon discovered that worry and anxiety were accompanied by a cessation of the peristaltic movement, and this led him to an extended study of the effects of emotion on the body and the relations of emotional strain to the activities of certain of the internal glands. As a result of his researches in this field Dr. Cannon has published "The Mechanical Factors of Digestion" and "Body Changes in Pain, Hunger, Fear and Rage." He served twenty-one months in France during the war studying the effects of wound shock, and a monograph embodying his conclusions will appear shortly. Dr. Cannon is also the author of "A Laboratory Course in Physiology."

THE OUTLOOK FOR EUROPE.

Alfred E. Zimmern Analyzes Its Recent Troubles and Sees Convalescence in Private Initiative.

Perhaps Alfred E. Zimmern, author of "Europe in Convalescence," will be best remembered by many readers as the author of "The Greek Commonwealth," a searching study into the dynamics of occidental society and government. He is an expert in such subjects, and so what he has to say at this time about the condition of Europe, of what Europe needs and what may be expected of it if it gets what it needs, and perhaps if it does not get what it needs, is of far more than passing interest just now. It is authoritative, with the authenticity of ripe scholarship and profound understanding applied to civilization's pressing problem, the puzzle of this age, propounded under the hard condition imposed on Ædipus by the Sphinx, "Solve it or die!"

For there is no doubt that Europe has been very ill. It is a small division of the surface of the earth, and according to Herbert Hoover its present population of about four hundred and fifty million is very near a hundred million more than it could naturally support on its own resources. Down to the war, it got along on a basis of much international trade, of skilled workmanship exported for raw materials and for food, much as England has to support its excessive population. But that was only possible through the operation of the most delicately balanced political and economic forces. The war went through that fabric like an owl through a cobweb and left little but the useless strands waving in the breeze. Here and there socialism has endeavored to catch them up and make something of them, but without avail. And Lloyd George, who had a chance to put Great Britain into a position of leadership and save the whole situation, proved in the crisis too much the political huckster and opportunist who wouldn't stay put, and whose vision was too narrow to understand what the world needed. He represented, not England's idealism, but her selfishness and her ambition, and to Zimmern he is really the man who "put back the clock."

Zimmern has the gift of vivid presentation of economic elements by presenting the essentials divested of the detail, and he gives us at the outset this sketch of the war as an economist would define it:

The economic history of the war-years is the record of a society, hitherto united in a single world-wide system of intercourse, suddenly divided into two. On the one side there is Britain and the overseas world, together with France, Italy, Holland, Spain and Portugal, Greece, Scandinavia, and Switzerland; on the other there is the vast blockaded area extending in Bethmann-Hollweg's words, "from Arras to Mesopotamia." For four and a half years these two worlds existed side by side, touching one another only at the trenches or through the carefully regulated relations of neutrals, each concentrating its whole strength upon the single purpose of overthrowing the opposing organization, so lately a part of its own. Viewed from the economic standpoint, the struggle was a civil war within what Graham Wallas has taught us to call "the Great Society."

The war really took the form of what our author calls "the siege of Europe," and brought it to this condition:

Let us briefly recall the situation with which the Allied statesmen were faced in October, 1918.

The world, as we have seen, was divided into two great systems of economic organization, the one oceanic, and in control of the world's chief sources of industrial raw material and of food supply, the other European. The Ocean had now definitely defeated the Continent; the besiegers had won the day. With the collapse of the German military power and its supersession by civil governments, now no longer five, but (counting the Baltic states) likely to become well-nigh a dozen in Europe alone, the organization which, like a steel corset, had held Europe together for the last four years, which had provided employment, transport, food, and finance for its hard-riden populations, was destined to disappear. Europe, "from the Rhine to the Volga," to quote from a memorandum written at the time, was in solution. It was not a question now of autocratic as against popular government; it was a question of government against anarchy. From one moment to the next every responsible student of public affairs, outside the ranks of the professed revolutionaries, however red his previous affiliations may have been, was turned perforce into a Conservative. The one urgent question was to get Europe back to work.

Demobilization had to be faced and carried out; and there was a certain terrible momentum to the iron flood of war materials and supplies that could neither be dammed nor diverted at once. The whole vast war organization had its commitments and its contracts, and the bridges back to civil industry were burned behind it. In Central Europe anarchy threatened on every hand. And the League of Nations did not greatly help. In fact, in Zimmern's view it hardly supplied any solution of the trouble, although in its Secretariat he sees a great engine for future good. As to its main object he says:

As a substitute, then, for the old Concert of the Powers the League has proved a disappointment. A standing organ of European, and still more, of world-policy, working upon an agreed and consistent basis of principle, is as impracticable today as it proved after 1815. Policies will continue to be shaped and coöperations and understanding to be concerted as during the last four centuries, as the need arises for adjusting inevitable disagreements, in this or that centre of state sovereignty, in London, Paris, Berlin, Rome, Prague, Tokio, Washington, and Buenos Aires, rather than in the spacious Council chamber that looks out over the Lake of Rousseau and Byron. To have imagined otherwise was to ignore the limitations of the human imagination and to forget that, in the closest analogue which exists to the comprehensive design of a League of Nations, in the British Empire, Ottawa and Melbourne and Pretoria—not to speak of Dublin—have not yet learnt to adjust their policies and purposes to the needs of the Commonwealth as a whole.

There is with this sharp-edged criticism no lack of constructive suggestion, and the author does not hesitate to affirm his faith in the system of the old régime, to some extent, and a Europe relying on itself. This statement seems admirably clear:

The present writer believes that a solution of these perplexities and complications can be found in one way alone, along the simple and well-tried road of the old Concert of the European Powers. Europe has not been saved from the West, nor yet from the East, as was hoped by two opposing sets of idealists. America and Russia, each in their own way, may yet return to play their part in the life of the old Continent. For present purposes, however, we must rule them out. Europe will be wise to adapt to her own case the old Italian motto: Europa farà da se. She must look to her own healing. Then perchance others, who seem at present to look on, kindly but unhelpful, from afar will find the will and the means to coöperate. And the healing must begin where the wound is deepest, from the Western end of the Continent. The goal of all good Europeans at this juncture should be to work for the establishment of relations of mutual confidence between Britain, France and Germany.

Reparations he thinks Germany should be made to pay in full, but when it comes to saddling war costs on her, that is a secondary matter, and one which too tragically interferes with the first. Here, he implies, Lloyd George overreached himself and precipitated most of the subsequent trouble:

Rheims Cathedral, the Town Hall Square of Arras, like the Cloth Hall of Ypres, have passed for ever into history, even as the heroes who defended them. But at least there can be a reparation, so that new life may spring up to replace the old and the busy hand of man once more reawaken and revivify the desolate tract which for four long years has marked the boundary of freedom. Reparation to France is not only, or mainly, a financial problem. It embodies a demand of human justice springing from the depth of the French soul. When the British Premier, aided by his Australian colleague, added war-costs to the Allied claim, he was not simply trebling, or even quadrupling, the total bill; he was mingling two tragically different elements of nativity. He was asking for Britain and Canada and Australia, for India and Portugal and Brazil, who had known nothing of the long-drawn shame and anguish of enemy occupation, a share in what should have been regarded as an almost sacred, if inadequate, tribute of recompense to the innocent civilians of the invaded lands.

Mr. Zimmern has no doubts about the guilt of Germany and apparently of the German people. It is not because of any innocence of theirs that he would gladly see the costs and pensions items stricken from the war bill, but because those items interfere with the payment of reparations which the French so sorely need. He says of the Germans:

If, as the evidence from June, 1914, onwards, proves up to the hilt, Germany was responsible for involving first the Balkans, then Europe, then almost the whole world, in the greatest war in history, then the Allied peoples are right in feeling that not the German state but the German people, men and women alike, are responsible for what is rightly described in the Allies' covering letter of June, 1919, as "the greatest crime against humanity and the freedom of peoples that any nation, calling itself civilized, has ever committed." And they will not feel free to enter into real relations of confidence with their late enemies until they have received more than constrained and perfunctory indications of sorrow and remorse on the German side.

In spite of such facts, our author sees no necessity for endless trouble between the Germans and the French, who are neighbors and might well be friends at some distant time in the future. This is a comparatively fresh view, and rather invigorating where so much has been taken for granted as to an irreconcilable and eternal conflict. It might well form the basis of a new alignment of Europe, other things being taken care of. He says:

So far, then, as ingrained German dispositions are concerned, there is no reason in the nature of things why the German Republic should not put the whole Wilhelmian tradition, with its methods and ambitions, aside as a nightmare and enter into relations of confidence and coöperation with France and Britain, particularly with France. Psychologically, as any observer can test for himself on the spot, France and Germany were intended to understand and not to misunderstand one another. Nature meant them to coöperate, not to collide.

Zimmern scolds his country roundly for having lost the opportunity of leadership, but is more inclined to blame Lloyd George than the spirit of Britain itself. He devotes some space to an explication of the "pre-armistice agreement" of November 4th, by which, with certain reservations, the Allies were practically engaged to make peace on the basis of President Wilson's Fourteen Points address, and he points to one clause of it drawn by the Allies of their own motion, whereby they were to demand pay only for the damages suffered during the war by their civilian citizens, and renounced all indemnity for the cost of the military and naval operations themselves. He declares the Allies took no steps to enlighten the public on the diplomatic situation, and the agreement was passed over in silence, but he maintains that it was a binding obligation, no less. After the armistice, he says, a section of the press, "with a lapse of memory more excusable in journalism than in statesmanship, neglecting the pre-armistice agreement of but a week or two before, loudly demanded that Germany should be asked to defray the entire cost of the war. After a few vain attempts at evasion the premier yielded, and was then led on, floundering and uncomfortable, from one pitfall to another." Delay, confusion, disillusionment followed in the few weeks after the war, and nothing was done to straighten out the bread-and-butter problems of the impoverished peoples. Among other ways in which Britain should do penance is the following:

There is another direction which must be briefly mentioned here, in which we can make amends for our misdeeds. We have seen that anxiety to secure "equality of trade conditions" according to Point 3 of the Fourteen Points was a leading consideration in the mind of German statesmen in demanding the armistice. It is no overstatement to say that Point 3 has found no practical embodiment in the Treaty at all. "No general conventions were concluded on this subject," says the authoritative English writer already cited, "because . . . there had been no sufficient prior consultation between the experts and no mature study of facts and projects"—another testimony to the results of the vicious procedure of the Conference. An American authority is even more explicit. After explaining in some detail what "equality of trade conditions" may be held to mean, that it is a declaration against discrimination, not against tariffs in general, he remarks, "The matter was not thrashed out in Paris." In point of fact the commercial section of the Treaty is full of one-sided obligations undertaken by Germany to which there correspond no guarantees of reciprocal treatment on the Allied side. But these obligations are limited in duration and come to an end, for the most part, in January, 1923, when, to quote from the Allies' covering letter of June, 1919, "the Allied and Associated Powers will be able" (though, be it observed, they do not bind themselves) "to coöperate with her (Germany) in arriving at a more permanent arrangement for the establishment of an equitable treatment for the commerce of all nations."

After this, one would naturally expect him to blame the treaty of Versailles for the existing evils of Europe, but hear what he says:

Europe's present difficulties, which have become familiar to public opinion both in Britain and America owing to the unemployment they have caused there, are not due primarily to the Treaty of Versailles or to the "Balkanization" of East-Central Europe. They are due first and chiefly to the character and duration of the war. They are the inevitable result of the Siege of Europe. They are due, secondly, to the failure of the besiegers to take prompt and adequate measures after the Armistice to provide the besieged area with the means for recuperating its industrial life. And only in the third plan and in a minor degree, are they due to the Treaties. As regards the Austrian and Hungarian Treaties the Habsburg Monarchy had fallen to pieces long before they were drafted; they can not be held responsible for the new frontiers, and consequent obstructions to trade, involved in its break-up. As regards the Versailles Treaty, perhaps the point to which the greatest criticism attaches, apart from the inclusion of unwarranted items in the German liability, is the delay and consequent unsettlement caused by leaving open two vital questions—the fate of Upper Silesia, and the amount of German indemnity. Of these the former has now been permanently settled, while the latter, fixed conformably with the Treaty in May, 1921, only remains unsettled because it is inseparably bound up with the question of the items of liability. The economic outlook in Europe, therefore, involves far wider issues than the "revision of the Treaties" with which it is often associated.

There has been much confusion about rates of exchange, and public finance, and the troubles of the governments as distinct from those of their peoples. On this head Zimmern makes some interesting observations:

The first point to be noted is that public finance is not an infallible index of national prosperity. The public finance of the European belligerents in the late war, with the exception of Great Britain, is in deplorable confusion; budgets are not being balanced and the outlook is obscure and dependent on hypothetical hopes and contingencies. The victors are looking for reparation and release from extra-European debts, the vanquished for reduction in their liability. Meanwhile governments are meeting their obligations, not by the normal method of taxation, or even by borrowing, but by debasing the currency, an expedient rendered easier for the modern world than for its ancient and mediæval predecessors along this primrose path by the discovery of the printing press as a device of government alchemy. The result is reflected in the table of foreign exchanges, the self-registering barometer of the public finances of the States of the world.

But public finance and private prosperity are two different things, in spite of close and delicate connections between them. The fact that the exchanges with the dollar have fallen in most European countries during the last year does not necessarily mean that Europe is not recuperating in other directions.

Not much hope is held out by socialism—rather the contrary. It is to capitalism and private initiative that Europe must look for regeneration, not to collectivistic visions. Convalescence is in progress, and the cure will come after this fashion rather than another:

Recuperation through private enterprise is a strange and unexpected result after the hopes of coöperative governmental action held out by the prospect of a League of Nations, and after three generations of propaganda for reform through socialism or state action. But the fact must be faced that, as the European situation has been allowed to develop since the armistice, the capitalist entrepreneur is more needed, is worth more to European society, than at any time since Europe was first opened up to modern industrialism in the first half of the last century. Men like Stinnes and Loucheur, Rathenau and Krassin, Inverforth and Leverhulme, little as we may sometimes like them, much as some of us might prefer the rule of a Robert Cecil or a Lansbury, do in fact, in virtue of certain gifts of mind and character, gifts that have in pre-war Europe as in present-day America been greatly overvalued and overpaid, hold the masterkey to the revival of prosperity for the populations whom the war has plunged into destitution.

There is a moving plea for a new-built civilization, free of the dross and materialism of the present, one looking "toward the unseen, toward the realm where moth and dust do not corrupt and where are garnered the riches which no grasping governments can tax and no fluctuations of exchange can diminish." That is very beautiful, but it might remind an irreverent materialist of our too abundant tax-free securities, and Professor Fisher's universal dollar. Neither poetry nor fervor will help the present situation. And it should not be forgotten that civilization needs a material basis and apparently always will.

EUROPE IN CONVALESCENCE. By Alfred E. Zimmern. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $2.50.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending July 8, 1922 (five days) were $128,800,000; for the corresponding week of last year (five days), $108,700,000; an increase of $20,100,000.

Monetary conditions are easy over the entire country, as evidenced by the liquidation of the Reserve banks. The low point of "discounted bills" in the twelve banks was on June 7th, last, when the total was $420,000,000, which compares with $1,896,000,000 on June 6, 1921, and $2,826,000,000 on November 5, past month, the pound sterling from the high point of $4.51½ to about $4.39, from which it has recovered a few cents. The franc and lira are down approximately one cent from their high point last Spring. As gold is now being regularly received in London from the South African mines, shipments to the United States have been renewed.

The junior Senator from North Dakota has introduced a bill for the payment of the Soldiers' bonus by an issue of paper money. In view of the Senator's known views the only surprising feature of the proposal is that providing for redemption. It looks as though the Senator was going out of his way to annoy the banks, by requiring them to do something that he actually believes to be unnecessary.

Industrial stability has been more nearly attained in the past thirty days than at any time since the beginning of the World War. Some industries have shown moderate gains, in others conditions have altered but little and in a few lines a seasonal dullness has occurred. The unfavorable factors in the situation are the continued deadlock in the coal strike and in the textile mills of New England and threats of strikes by those classes of railroad labor affected by recent decisions of the United States Railroad Labor Board, says the National Bank of Commerce in New York in their monthly letter.

Iron and steel output for May showed further gains, and the unfilled orders of the United States Steel Corporation have increased. Automobile production during May established new high records. The rubber manufacturing industry is sharing in the activity in automobile manufacturing. Conditions in the hide market are not yet satisfactory but stocks are not large and both tanners and manufacturing consumers of leather feel reasonably sure that prices of hides and skins will not go lower. Stocks of leather are heavy but the market is becoming more active for all classes. In the shoe industry there is evidence of a slowly improving demand which is being felt not only in the Middle West but in New England, where heretofore the industry has been especially depressed.

In the textile and related industries, the foremost problem is whether the higher prices resulting from rising costs of raw materials can be passed on to the consumer. The wool manufacture is operating nearly at capacity. The cotton textile industry in the South is active but strike conditions continue to prevail in New England. There is evidence of a slightly improved demand for broad silks but taking the country as a whole, this division of the silk industry is probably at little more than 50 per cent. of capacity.

The cement, lumber and brick industries have met with some difficulty in satisfying demand because of the large volume of building and construction under way throughout the country. The distribution of agricultural implements continues to be fairly active, although the industry is still affected by the curtailed purchasing power of the farmer. The June estimate is for a wheat crop somewhat larger than the average of the five preceding years. This offers promise of an improvement in conditions in those areas where wheat is the leading crop. Large yields of oats, barley and rye and a heavy hay crop are also forecast and pastures are excellent. Weather conditions for corn and cotton have not been satisfactory thus far, and both are late.

Conditions in the retail dry goods trade vary considerably in different parts of the country. In some of the strike areas, business has fallen off heavily. As yet the improved outlook in agriculture is not reflected in any marked increase in buying, agricultural betterment thus far being primarily one of sentiment. On the other hand, a definite improvement is reported in retail trade in those cities where unemployment is being reduced and payrolls increased. Wholesale distribution in many lines was not satisfactory during May, but is now beginning to improve.

In the past month there have been important decisions affecting the railroads. These are a horizontal cut of 10 per cent. in freight rates, a reduction to 5¼ per cent. of the "fair return" basis for purposes of fixing rates, and a series of wage reductions affecting 800,000 men. The effect of the cut in freight rates can not now be gauged, and the reduction in the "fair return" basis is not likely to have any immediate effect, but the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission is regarded in some quarters as indicating a continuation of its policy, which has militated against securing adequate capital. Wages constitute the most important phase of the problem of rates. The reductions ordered by the United States Railroad Labor Board are estimated at $100,000,000 annually and have caused much criticism by railroad labor as being too drastic. They have caused equal criticism by railroad officials as being insufficient in relation to the rate cuts.

The economic unity of the United States and its future development are dependent on adequate railroad transportation and such transportation must ultimately pay its way, whether by freight rates or by taxation. Experiments in governmental ownership, operation and control throughout the world during recent years have proved beyond question that private operation, with all its faults, is more economical and efficient than public operation and control. Ultimately railroad rates will have to be fixed at a point which will render the roads self-supporting and make railroad securities sufficiently attractive to provide capital for necessary extensions and satisfactory maintenance.

The most perplexing problem in connection with transportation is the determination of rates which will be fair and productive. From the very nature of the case rate-fixing is always sure to be somewhat arbitrary, delicate adjustment being required to guard against depriving the roads of freight by rates too high, and against financial disaster through rates too low. The problems involved are so complicated that the only reasonable line of action on the part both of the railroads and of the railroad workers seems to be to accept in good faith the decisions as rendered in order that they may be tested by time.

The fact that the railroads of Canada, the Canadian Pacific system excepted, are now owned by the government, is referred to from time to time by the advocates of government ownership in the United States, in a manner calculated to convey the impression that Canada is leading this country in progressive policies and that only "reactionary" influence is holding this country back.

The Canadian government became heavily involved in the railroads by guaranteeing the bonds of private corporations in order to make them saleable in foreign markets. The ultimate purpose was to open up new territory to settlement and increase the population of the country. Before the new lines could get on a paying basis, the war broke out, operating expenses increased, the roads defaulted on their obligations and could not even meet operating expenses. The situation was so bad that apparently the only way out was for the government to take over the roads, virtually by foreclosure proceedings.

Anyone who is interested in knowing the facts about this governmental investment should read an article written by J. L. Payne, a former statistician in the Department of Railways and Canals, which appeared recently in the Toronto Saturday Night. He says in part:

"At least $763,337,214 and probably $100,000,000 more has been added to the public debt of Canada, since 1914 on account of publicly owned railways. Have the people of Canada been aware of that fact? They have not. They have believed the war was responsible for all the growth of our debt.

"Every time this gigantic debt snowball makes an annual revolution it has the terrible power of adding at least $38,000,000 in interest. If there were nothing else but this interest and the deficits, the national railway system is costing at least $108,000,000 a year. Unhappily if the account were made up as those of a corporate business would be, the amount would not fall below $140,000,000 a year."

The earnings were less than operating expenses by $27,000,000 in 1919; $47,000,000 in 1920 and $70,000,000 in 1921. In addition to the deficits and interest payments, the expenditures since 1915 on capital account have aggregated $147,859,393.

In times when a spirit of optimism pervades the community, free spending and business expansion will be general and a perponderance of the people will be spending their incomes or wanting to borrow, and the demands upon the available supply of new capital or savings will be strong enough to advance the interest rate. At other times, when the general outlook appears unfavorable, and people are inclined to be pessimistic or cautious, expenditures will be cut down, expansion will be checked, the demand for loans will fall off, capital will be released from trade, new capital will accumulate in excess of demands for it, and the hiring price of capital, or what we call the rate of interest, will fall. The inevitable tendency is to find the point of equilibrium—the rate of interest at which the supply of capital will be absorbed by the demand.

Comparatively few borrowers are under the necessity of borrowing at any price; most of them borrow for the purpose of carrying on operations from which they expect to make a profit, and the high rates tend to restrict borrowing. On the other hand, bankers are lending, for the most part, other people's capital. They can not control either supply or demand, but they try to adjust interest so that supply and demand will meet and offset each other. Nothing is to be gained by the public from arbitrary efforts to control rates, for the rates are merely signs of a relative plenitude or scarcity of capital, and although the supply of capital may be diminished in any market by harsh and arbitrary treatment, it can not be increased in that manner. It can be increased only by production and saving, and high rates encourage and directly contribute to such increase. High interest rates show that debt-creation and expenditures are getting ahead of capital accumulations; they are in themselves a warning sign, and exercise a wholesome pressure in restraint. A healthy state of credit and of industry require that the equilibrium between supply and de-

The average reduction of all loans in member banks is about 12 per cent. from the top, but of commercial loans about 30 per cent. Of commercial loans in New York City banks it is about 40 per cent. count rates by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, when on June 22d this rate was lowered from 4½ per cent. to 4 per cent.

Coincident with this reduction in rediscount rates the renewal rate for call money declined to 2¾ per cent.—the lowest on record since back in 1917. The decidedly easier money conditions have been felt for some time in both the business world and in the stock market, and this outward evidence—the decrease in rediscount rates and the drop in call money—was bound to come.

Last week the combined Federal Reserve ratio stood at 79.1 per cent., which, up to that time, was the highest point touched since September 21, 1917. Total reserves stood at $3,147,675,000, compared with some $2,650,000,000 a year ago.

As to the necessary credit available for business development and growth, the huge supplies of money and credit now under control would permit the proper financing of American business expansion with perfect ease and without the tremendous strain heretofore seen in previous business revivals.

With 343,653 depositors shown in its statement of condition, published recently, the Bank of Italy reports a gain of more than 52,000 customers for the first six months of 1922. During this same period, the bank's resources have increased from $194,179,449 to $213,584,833, a growth of over $18,000,000.

The gain recorded for this half year is in excess of that for the first six months of 1919 when the Wall Street Journal credited the Bank of Italy with the largest increase of any bank in the United States.

The activity of large banking institutions is an unfailing barometer of commercial activity. The fact that American banks in Paris are seeking larger quarters to meet the increasing volume of business is a sure indication of the growth of commercial activity between the United States and Europe.

The Paris office of the Equitable Trust Company of New York, which was established in 1910, has far outgrown its original quarters and has recently found it necessary to secure space on two additional floors in the large office building at 23 Rue de la Paix.

Howard L. Mack, resident partner of McDonnell & Co., has returned from New York, where he has been for several weeks. He declares that the State Department is nearer an understanding with the Russian government than ever before and that the situation there is better than it has been in some time. In fact, he declares, it is not as bad as reported.

Students of early institutions seem now fairly well agreed that the world's troubles date from the time when man, the stronger animal, wrested the sceptre of rule from the woman, the original head of the family and the tribe. Statesmanship, the science of observing and the art of training latent tendencies, is by no means the exclusive possession of the male. Man is the slave of the immediate, the obvious, his motto "do the next thing," the wide expanse of the future, speaking generally, a sealed book to his blurred and limited vision. The brain behind the hand that rocks the cradle is, if the teachings of history have any meaning, the brain best equipped to rule the world, say Strassburger & Co. in the Review.

There is warrant for this view in what is transpiring in Europe today. Two great forces are contending for the mastery, their puppets the rulers of France and England. France, from the earliest days the personification of femininity, sees clearly what is apparently beyond the conception of the more masculine Anglo-Saxon. Imagined need of her is driving Great Britain into Germany's hands; France would watch over and help the new states of Central Europe that are the fruits of her labor pangs.

With us it lies to determine the issue. We hold all the cards, if we care to play them. There is not a nation in the world today that would refuse to defer to our ruling. A word, a hint even, from our President (if it could be made certain that he will have the support of the nation he has been elected to rule), would dissolve into air the schemes of the military parties in Germany and Russia, would moderate the commercialized policy of Great Britain, give assurance to France, and put an end to the petty wranglings of the minor powers.

We know, on the one hand, that Europe, taken as a whole, is rapidly recovering her financial poise. Britain, with or without German reparations, is ready and well able to cancel the debts due to her from the other nations that fought by her side, to pay nevertheless every cent of her debt to us. Of France it may be said at least that she proudly prefers to pay us what we have lent her, whether we support her claims on Germany or not, though it will place her citizens in bonds for a quarter of a century. The same is true of all the other nations, large or small—Russia alone, perhaps, excepted.

We know, on the other hand, that plotting which we could render nugatory, is going forward between the monarchist-military party in Germany and the extremists of the Soviet régime in Russia. We have sufficient evidence that a tentative war treaty has been concluded. We know that German money is reconstructing Russian railroads, that it owns ships in Russian ports. We know that Ludendorff's aides have been seen in the streets of Moscow, arm-in-arm with Hugo Stinnes' secretaries. We hear that thousands of aeroplane engines, hundreds of howitzers have been unearthed, that many more probably lie hidden in factories in Saxony and elsewhere. We know that the army of Germany is composed mainly of non-commissioned officers, that the period of training for young men has been so reduced that before three years have gone over our heads she will

There are many things to consider in buying a bond—marketability, maturity, rate of return, yield, taxability, call provisions, likelihood of enhancement in value.

But, more important than all of these, first and always to be considered, is the permanent safety of your investment.

Your most effectual assurance of safety lies in the selection of a bond house that insists upon adhering to strictly conservative standards. No issue of bonds, for example, is admitted to our list of offerings until we have established its permanent safety, its sound investment merit according to such standards.

From our well-balanced list of safe bonds, you can easily select an issue that meets your investment needs in all respects. Write, phone, or call today for descriptive matter.

available, at a moment's notice, an army not far short of five million trained men. We know that every enemy of Ludendorff or Stinnes is a mark for the assassin.

If France could forget the lessons of history, she might be able to regard the situation with the complacency with which this country and Great Britain think they can afford to. But France can not forget, to quote from Le Matin:

"One hundred years before Christ, 300,000 Germans invaded France, murdering, burning, pillaging as they went. At Aix-en-Provence they were stopped and defeated. They sued for peace and swore they would never do it again. Sixty years afterward 240,000 Germans invaded the Jura district of France. Six years later 400,000 Germans invaded the territory between the Meuse and the Oise. They were beaten. They swore they would never do it again.

"Sixty years before Christ, the Germans invaded the left bank of the Rhine. Two hundred and thirty years after Christ the Germans invaded France. They were beaten. They swore they would never do it again. Twenty years later, another invasion, another defeat, another solemn pledge, 'never again.' In 274 A. D. the Rhone basin was invaded by the Germans; in 275 A. D. north-eastern France. In 301 Langres was pillaged. The invaders were beaten, and they swore 'never again.' In 351 they reconquered the left bank of the Rhine. In 354 they devastated Lyons, in 360 Besancon. In 364 they invaded and plundered Belgium.

"Here is the chronology of the subsequent invasions: 372, 382, 400, 410, 413, 800, 858, 978, 1124, 1214, 1513, 1521, 1523, 1536, 1544, 1552, 1555, 1567, 1569, 1576, 1587, 1636, 1674, 1675, 1701, 1708, 1744, 1792, 1793, 1814, 1815, 1870, 1914. Thirty-three invasions in a little over fifteen hundred years, an average of one invasion in every fifty years."

France is not asking, it must be repeated, that we forgive her money debt to us. What she does ask, and has every right to ask, is that we refrain from throwing cheap gibes at her; that we cease to demand disarmament without giving her definite assurance that we are with her, to the last dollar, to the last man, if she is attacked through no fault of her own: that we say the word that will stir the British people to remembrance that their proper place is, as it has been in the greatest periods of their history, on the side of the weak and helpless—in the camp where we have ourselves always sought to be.

Rejoicing in the fact that yellow fever will soon disappear from South America, the Petit Parisien invokes thanks to the sardines. It is known that the fever is communicated by the bite of a mosquito that lives in the swamps. Now it has been noticed that a species of sardine, the shatta, gets easily acclimated in fresh water and, what is more, it manifests a very marked predilection for the larvæ of mosquitoes. One can easily guess the sequel. The shattas, netted in great numbers, are thrown into the marshes, where they destroy the larvæ. No more mosquitoes, no more fever. Thus the sardine takes its place among the benefactors of humanity!

The first gladiators were exhibited at Rome in 264 B. C.

How can we ever complain of being forgotten, or that we shall be forgotten, when we so soon forget? Undoubtedly this has been said before, and better, but the expression is excited again by the new one-volume edition of the "Life of William Morris," by Mackail. Who thinks of William Morris now? Who gives thanks to him when he sinks into that most comfortable bit of domestic furniture in the world, a Morris chair? Or looks at wall-paper less hideous than the vertical stripes our grandparents had to endure? As for his three faces of type, the Chaucer, the Golden, and the Troy, they do not seem to have worked very well, and printers prefer Caslon or some more conventional face, or that one with the Italian name—Bodoni; that is because he could not do everything well, and his type faces were, in this writer's opinion at least, lacking in real beauty. But when you read his "Sigurd the Volsung," or "The Earthly Paradise," did you ever dream that you could one day get along so well without reading them at all any more?

As a matter of fact, we are surrounded in our homes today by the influence of William Morris, who rescued domesticity from the anti-macassar horrors of two generations ago, from the gilded frying-pan style of wall embellishment, from carpet designs so dreadful that they did a vast deal for the outdoor life, from wall-papers that made night welcome and the lamps a nuisance and took the edge off the terrors of bad dreams. Yes, we owe Morris much; but we have got into the habit of taking his benefactions for granted like the atmosphere, which we never miss until we nearly drown or the whooping-cough shuts off our wind, and as for the younger generation, they know more about the inventor of Eskimo Pie and the local wielders of the saxophone than they do about Fafrer the Worm and the terrible fight he put up. As for that, what has become of the Browning clubs we used to have all about us? In the immortal words of Leland, also forgotten, they are "away in der Ewigheit." Browning is no longer considered necessary to that superior attitude toward life and other people which once differentiated the intellectual aristocrat from the common human being, or low-brow. A number of us have discovered that we get on quite well morally with the Book of Common Prayer instead of reciting Childe Roland before breakfast every morning, and the younger generation again is disposed to inquire, Who in thunder was Browning, anyhow? But Browning only wrote poetry. There does not seem to have been much William Morris did not do or attempt; and what he attempted he usually came near executing, with more than tolerable execution.

It can not be said that the world refused to take Morris seriously; not when his designs have affected the product of furniture factories in Grand Rapids, and carpet mills in Lowell. There was a certain great practicality in him, despite the fact of his poetic and theoretical socialism. He made art live—not the greatest art, perhaps, but the sort that affects life in general. He operated an interior decorating business, which was his chief practical pursuit, and in thirty-five years of such activity he accomplished a complete revolution in public taste. We should have grown tired of wax flowers in time. It is probably owing to Morris that our parents grew tired of them before we suffered seriously from the affliction, and that they disappeared just when they did from the terrible and tomb-like old marble "mantels" on which they used to stand in oval glass domes, flanked by stuffed parrots or the tin-plated altar ornaments of joss houses. He puttered with novel writing, and with stained glass window making, and his workshops reflected his saturation with medievalism and socialism and other forms of unearthly and anti-modern feeling. He was a sort of anti-Victorian Victorian. And that the Victorian age could have produced him is one of its best claims to greatness, whether we quite think Morris great or not.

With Morris, socialism was a vital, breathing sentiment. He felt the brotherhood of man, and in his shops he practiced it as far as man would let him. He was what we should call today a soap-boxer, too; and it is supposed that much speaking at open-air socialistic meetings hastened his death—although soap-boxers do not as a rule appear especially short-lived. Of course, his socialism had to have literary expression, which it received in his books "John Ball" and "News from Nowhere." He took a leading part in the socialist movement in England in the early 'eighties—but if he had done nothing else there would be no use in discussing him here; he would belong merely to the phenomena of sociology, and economic alienation, and the history of politics. As it is, he belongs to literature, and to art, and to the general life he ornamented and enriched, and whose visual horrors he labored successfully to reduce. He dabbled, not merely with furniture and wall paper, but also with textiles, and if comment on these practical things keeps recurring in any comment on him, it is because they recurred throughout his career and are inseparable from it—are, perhaps, the best part of it. Certainly the inventor of a good armchair is entitled to fame—if for nothing else, then because of the intimate relationship that exists between an armchair and literature. A good book is a good book, but it is a far better book if you read it in a Morris chair. You will get the meat out of it easier, and find fewer things to offend you. And if you can so arrange life that once in awhile you can sit in a Morris chair in a room papered with pictures of great peonies and overlapping foliage, and read "The Life and Death of Jason," you will be physically and mentally supported, surrounded, and saturated with William Morris. Can any other author take such possession of us? So when Longmans, Green & Co. put out at $3.50 a single-volume edition of Mr. J. W. Mackail's "Life of William Morris," it is worth noticing.

Old things and writers appealed to Morris more than new things and writers. He seems to have been a little bit the Dean Inge of his day. His literary admirations are peculiar. He had no liking whatever for Stevenson, Meredith, or Ibsen, but he liked Maeterlinck and Mark Twain. He was tremendously human, and rubbed elbows with life in a hundred ways, quite after the manner of the medieval man who was master of all trades and arts and did not cramp his genius by specialization. William Morris lived life to the full, and he died at Kelmscott House, Hammersmith, on October 3, 1896. Peace to his ashes; he was a great human being.

Notes of Books and Authors.

The Century Company seems to be trying to cover the world with travel writers. E. Alexander Powell is in Persia and near territories for book and magazine material. Harry A. Franck is at this moment probably eating in the home of a hairy Ainu in Northern Japan. Herbert Adams Gibbons is in the country around Constantinople and will cover all the Near East before he returns. Charles Hanson Towne, whose cheerful walking book, "Loafing Down Long Island," was so well received last year, has just departed from New York to ramble in the land of the Acadians for another book. And Webb Waldron, Frederick O'Brien, Sydney Greenbie, and T. M. Longstreth will soon be on their separate ways to new, strange, far-off places.

The Danish Times and the Scandinavian Review have given their hearty approval to the new edition of Anderson's Fairy Tales and Stories, edited by Signe Toksvig and introduced by Francis Hackett. Many of the pictures by Eric Pape and sections of the text have been reproduced in Danish mediums in this country. The book was published last fall by the Macmillan Company.

Booksellers regret that every tenth customer to ask for Margaret Deland's new book, "The Vehement Flame," pronounces it with the accent on the second syllable. Harper & Brothers, the publishers, offer the following suggestion and comment: Customers should remember that the tendency of the English language is to move the accent back. It has now reached the first syllable, as demonstrated by a list of such words as comparable, exquisite, and balcony.

W. Haslam Mills, one of the editors of the Manchester Guardian, has written a history of that paper which Henry Holt & Co. have just brought out under the title, "The Manchester Guardian, A Century of History." Mr. C. P. Scott, editor and owner of the paper, has written a special introduction for the American edition.

Thomas Seltzer announces for early publication "Batouala," by René Maran, the negro author who received the Prix Goncourt. The book is reported to be selling 8000 copies a day in France.

"Senescence: The Last Half of Life," by G. Stanley Hall, just published by D. Appleton & Co., is similar in nature to the psychologist's earlier "Adolescence." In "Senescence" Dr. Hall treats of the aspects of age, telling what men of all ages have thought and learned concerning the problems of the last half of life, and sets forth a useful programme for those approaching old age.

Dodd, Mead & Co. are publishing a second American edition of "The Secrets of a Kuttite," Captain E. O. Mousley's stirring narrative of true adventure in the East, before, during and after the Siege of Kut. Captain Mousley was a member of the British Commission to Washington during the Disarmament Conference and recently attended the Genoa Conference in an official capacity.

A. S. M. Hutchinson is staggered by the success of "If Winter Comes," and when asked if he had any views on the reasons for the popularity of that novel, he said: "I wanted to write a story—that's all. I wrote it as well as I could. I never dreamed it was going to attract people to this extent.

Spend a pleasant hour in the real "Old Book Shop" at 2 TILLMAN PLACE, OFF GRANT AVENUE—below Sutter.
Rare Old Books Bought, Sold and Hunted For by GEORGE HARGENS (formerly of the White House)

Nobody can possibly be as surprised as I am. I don't think there is a recipe for popularity. If a man sat down deliberately to write a 'best seller'—horrid phrase, isn't it?—he probably wouldn't. I can't imagine its being done that way. A book just happens to take people's fancy."

The latest from England is that we are to have a new tidal wave of British lecturers in the fall. G. K. Chesterton is said to be looking forward to a second visit at that time and Mr. John Drinkwater whose play "Abraham Lincoln" is even now billed for a San Francisco play house, is also to lecture us in the fall of the year. Mr. Hugh Walpole, who knows America well has a definite programme. He is to deliver a series of lectures on the unusual subject, twentieth century English novels.

Two of the Pulitzer prizes in American letters for the year 1921 were awarded to Macmillan authors—Edwin Arlington Robinson for his "Collected Poems" and Hamlin Garland for his "Daughter of the Middle Border."

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Caravans by Night.

An adventure story that is like a segment of the Arabian Nights is Harry Hervey's aptly-named "Caravans by Night"—a tale of India, instead of Arabia, that is rife with stolen crown jewels, secret orders, beautiful adventuresses and other Oriental mysteries. Mr. Hervey has lived in India, and though most of his readers probably have not, they will nevertheless appreciate the tang of reality he has given his lurid romance. One does not expect reality of an exotic mystery. In fact, one would not hold it against a teller of such tales if he had never set foot in the fabulous land selected for a stage setting. It is therefore so much to the good when a writer has, like Mr. Hervey, studied his mise en scène at first hand.

In addition to the really vivid representation of India—and Mr. Hervey has a nice command of phrases—in which, incidentally, actuality is not sacrificed to Western squeamishness, or at least not much, "Caravans by Night" boasts a secret service agent, the slippery, inimitable Euan Kerth, whose personality is as intriguing as Sherlock Holmes' own. One's only regret is that there is not more of Euan Kerth. But we suspect there will be more in a later book.

The Love Match.

It was J. M. Barrie who invented the "Better Dead" society for the combined benefit of humanity and authors who had done their best work. The idea was that humanity as represented by the reading public should be spared, and writers who were no longer capable of what they once were should be mercifully put out of the way in some Nevada-esque lethal chamber. That was Mr. Barrie's idea, and making due allowance for poetic fantasy, it is ours. We have not read Mr. Bennett's "Mr. Prohack," but we have just made an attempt to read "The Love Match." It is pathetic to think that the inventor of the inimitable Hilda could produce anything so feeble. We almost said "puerile" because, curiously enough, "The Love Match" in its forced witty chatter reminds one of the work of a clever youngster. Since we are talking so much about Sir James Barrie—the case of Mr. Bennett's "The Love Match" is an exact antithesis of "The Young Visitors," which was supposedly the work of a clever youngster and which Sir James, the sly, was accused of having produced. Be that as it may, for the sake of the Clayhanger trilogy we wish that Mr. Bennett could step forward and gracefully admit that "The Love Match" is the work of a youthful Daisy somebody or other.

Italy Old and New.

Strictly speaking, a travel book should not be written by a traveler. Tagore says that even so eminent a one as Kipling has never penetrated the mask of India and practically all French text-books have an introduction to the effect that the "Real France" is never known by the outsider. Since this is so, and to a greater or less degree is so of every other country, one can either give up in despair or resign himself to the genial misinformation of the casual traveler. Even we Americans insist that foreigners never interpret us aright. Is every country, then, to be left to render its own "travel impressions"? The result would be as biased as Teutonic imperial propaganda. Evidently we must resign ourselves to never knowing the "Real" France, India, or whatnot, but meanwhile we are entitled to our own opinions.

Elizabeth Hazelton Haight, professor of Latin at Vassar, has just published hers of Italy in an extremely attractive travelogue, "Italy Old and New." The chief beauty of Miss Haight's book is that, whereas she may not know the "Real Italy" of today, she does know the bona fide article of the past at least as well as any scholar can know it. To the casual student of history, only too prone to think of the past as veritably dead, it is intensely interesting to have it resuscitated in Miss Haight's analogies between the old and the new, in her indefatigable linking of classic and mediæval Italy with the familiar modern names that in our ignorance we associate rather with spaghetti than with Cicero or Hannibal. Such ignorance, however, does not survive "Italy Old and New"—sufficient reason for commending it to any one who wishes to extend the boundaries of his historic and geographic enjoyment.

Mortal Coils

Like nothing else under the sun is "Mortal Coils." It must even tax the classifying abilities of a librarian. Actually, the book is composed of a short story, "The Gioconda Smile," that is dimly reminiscent of Poe, but that also smacks of H. G. Wells; a play in one act, "Permutations Among the Nightingales"; a longish sketch with a sardonically ironic theme, entitled "The Tillotson Banquet," which, we take it, is reminiscent of nothing at all unless possibly Mr. Huxley's previous work; a short story, of exquisite clarity, that might both for theme and treatment have been produced by Katharine Mansfield; and a semi-humorous, semi-ghostly sketch, "Nuns at Luncheon." But all that is the barest classification. One must read the thing just as one must read Poe to have any adequate notion of its peculiar horrors. In two respects at least, Mr. Huxley is Poe's superior. For Poe fell down when he attempted the humorous thing. Nothing in literature is more amateurish than his story of the short-sighted man who married his great-grandmother; and Poe was dependent on a feverish imagination for his horrors. Mr. Huxley draws his from reality and his funny situations from the same source. Perhaps that is why his tragedy and comedy are equally well done and occur in equal portions throughout these astonishing sketches. Judging from the excerpts on the publisher's cover, he is generally hailed as a humorist. This, too, is poor classification. He is a humorist only as destiny is. These peculiar stories and sketches ring with the irony and comedy of fate, but every one of them is equally imbued with its grimness and horror. Mr. Huxley is a remarkable writer and he surely takes the English-speaking title for realism. In that respect he is on a level with the Russians and the French.

Seizer of Eagles.

James Willard Schultz has written another of his Blackfoot stories for boys, this one relating the varied adventures of Little Otter, an ambitious Indian boy who became a "Seizer of Eagles," a position much sought after among the Blackfeet, which is only attained after many ordeals and rigorous training. Mr. Schultz is an old-time frontiersman who draws on actual experience among the Indians—he is himself an Indian by adoption—in writing his thrilling Indian tales. "Seizer of Eagles" is an Indian thriller to delight the heart of any boy.

Miss I. A. R. Wylie, author of "The Dark House" (Dutton), has had an interesting youthful career. She had no education till she was twelve years old, when she was sent for several years to a "finishing school" in Brussels. After that two years were spent acquiring the "rudiments of an education" at Cheltenham College, England. Another finishing school in Germany literally finished her formal education. Among other remarkable feats, Miss Wylie records that at the age of eleven she had already done several long cycling tours, extending over a week, and done at the rate of fifty miles a day, completely by herself. She stopped where she chose and paid her own hotel bills out of the lavish allowance supplied by her widowed father, whom Miss Wylie describes as an "extraordinary personality." At fourteen, she toured the fjords of Norway alone. At the age of twenty she decided she needed more liberty and started out on "her own." She turned to writing and had remarkable luck in having her early work immediately accepted. Her first novel, written at twenty-two, was accepted in England and America, was serialized in an English magazine, and was subsequently filmed. She was active in war work at the front till her health gave away. She has been a "violent" suffragist. Her ambition is to write something first class, which she hopes to do in a few years. Miss Wylie is an Australian girl and is in her early thirties.

About three years ago Miss Amy Lowell prepared what she called a Bookshelf of Modern Poets, the list containing those books which she regarded as indicative of the spirit of modern verse. Miss Lowell having revised the list, her selections are likely again to become the subject of discussion among our poets and their readers. Among young Americans represented is Jean Starr Untermeyer with her two books, "Growing Pains" and "Dreams Out of Darkness." Another conspicuous figure—an Englishman—is D. H. Lawrence, whose "Amores" and "New Poems" are on the list. B. W. Huebsch is the publisher of these two moderns.
